All right. We'll take it back to this extent. Mr. Phillips has not written a book for the illiterate, but so many of the beginners are illiterate in a literary sense, that it means pretty much the same thing. Most people who start to write photoplays need something so simply expressed that Mr. Phillips' work is not sufficient, since he sends his message to the man who is supposed to be able to understand good English, and we took it for granted that the sort of man who can understand could also understand that he should read all he could on the subject. Now, this does not mean that the photodrama is not clearly and intelligibly written as well as intelligently written. It simply means that too many of those who "take up" photoplay writing cannot read with understanding the ordinary good English, and Mr. Phillips has written in literary instead of primmer English, that's all.

Mr. Phillips advances little that is new in that he must follow the general lines of technique to write an honest volume on technique. The work is original in treatment and thought in that he has written his own book instead of merely paraphrasing the books of others.

And just in passing, Mr. Phillips adds that already the Photodrama is selling better than The Plot of the Short Story, though the latter book occupies a field by itself. More people want to know about photoplay than about plots, though the plot is the soul of the photoplay as well as the short story and the book—with certain exceptions having to do with camera technique—is as useful to the photoplay writer as to the fiction author. If more persons tried to write real photoplays instead of merely making money, there would be better photoplays to select from.

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT is an established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until the excellence of such articles have been demonstrated to its editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two or three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending four cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay. Special replies by mail on matters which cannot be replied to in the department, one dollar.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready, and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you cannot answer without a lot of study. Canadians should send P. O. M. O. or coin only.

Question No. 59.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Theater managers looking for high-class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

What do you understand by an "outlet box?" A "junction box?" Give best method of running the various operating room circuits under different conditions, and tell us what you would do about locating conduit if you were building a concrete or brick operating room.

Roll of Honor.

Question No. 53 was a sticker. The Roll of Honor consists of A. C. Stewart, Waitsburg, Washington; Montreal, Canada; L. C. LaGrow, Albany, New York; J. I. Roberts, Nashville, Tennessee; Allie Baron, Lodi, California, and John Solar, Watertown, New York, who sent in an excellent reply which came too late to be considered for publication.

The reply of Brother Stewart has again been selected as best. He gives a fairly correct answer in a few words.

Answer to Question No. 53.

The Question:

Could you use ordinary copper wire for resistance (rheostat) coils to cut down the voltage for a projection lamp? If you say yes, then give us full data for such a rheostat. Explain how light is produced in an incandescent globe—why the filament gets incandescent, and why it always gets just so hot and no hotter.

The Answer:

Copper wire could be used for rheostats, the objections being high cost and the large amount necessary. If we needed 31 amperes, and the supply was 110 volt d.c., we would deduct the arc drop of 48 volts, leaving 62 volts to be taken care of by the rheostat. Dividing 62 by 31 shows that we need two ohms resistance. No. 10 wire has an area of 10.380 c.m.

$$\frac{10{,}380 \times 2}{10.8} = 1{,}922 \text{ feet of wire}$$

We could use smaller wire and a shorter length, in which case the wire would operate at a higher temperature.

When the switch is closed on an incandescent carbon lamp, the current tries to get through the high resistance of the carbon filament. The friction of the current generates heat. The hotter the carbon gets, the less resistance it offers, and the more current flows. This goes on until the filament gets incandescent, giving off a comparatively small percentage of light and a large percentage of heat. If the filament is metallic the current goes through with a rush, as it has less resistance when cold than when hot. This can be proved by switching on a mixed load of carbon and tungsten lamps. You will see the tungsten lamps reach incandescence before the carbons. While heat is being generated it is also being dissipated. When the rate of generation and dissipation become equal, equilibrium is established, and the temperature thereafter remains constant.

[I am not quite certain myself as to one point, nor have I time to look it up at present. The heat from an incandescent filament is dissipated very slowly, since the filament is in a fairly complete vacuum. My understanding has been that, while the resistance of the carbon filament decreases with the rise of temperature up to a certain point, at a certain point it abruptly rises again. Now this may or may not be correct. At any rate, Brother Stewart has demonstrated the proposition that he understands the points involved at least as well as the editor does.

Friend Roberts went into a somewhat lengthy explanation of the choking action of a.c., giving it as his opinion that, one to the magnetic kick set up by a.c. current in passng through coils, a copper rheostat was practical. Theoretically yes, practically no, by reason of the fact that, due to the amount of heat generated, the oxidization of the copper would be rapid, and, moreover, I believe the vibration of the coils due to the aforesaid magnetic action would cause them to sag very soon. Brother Stewart is correct. A copper rheostat would theoretically be practical, and, as a matter of fact, could be used, but when it comes right down to brass tacks the thing is impractical by reason of its cost, and, I think, also by reason of its short life. Friend Stewart, however, left out one very important item, viz.: the temperature. He has figured his resistance at normal temperature. —Ed.]

Rheostat Connection.

South Berkley, California, is puzzled by that old poser, the position of the rheostat. He says:

> I cannot understand clearly concerning the rheostat connection. Carefully reading the Handbook would seem to indicate in one place that the rheostat should be on the positive, but in other places it shows drawings in which the rheostat is on the negative. It would seem, after studying the book, that when a rheostat is used on d.c. it should always be on the positive line, since otherwise the resistance would come after the current has passed through the arc. On a.c. it would seem as though both wires should go through the rheostat in order to get the full benefit. In the Handbook, Fig. 48, 51 and 53 show the rheostat on the positive, while Fig. 54, 58 and 59 show it on the negative. The thing which confuses me is how do you get the benefit of the resistance if you do not get it before the current reaches the arc?

Well, brother, you are not the first one to be confused on that particular proposition. It had the editor up in the air for a good long time in days gone by. It is perhaps one of the hardest things there is in all the realm of electrics to explain intelligently, but I'll make the best stagger I can at it. It does not make any difference whatever whether the rheostat be placed in the positive or the negative wire of d.c. projection circuit. As a matter of fact, I do not think any living man knows exactly what "voltage" consists of, or how it acts. We only know its result in overcoming resistance. We know a certain thing will happen when electric voltage is applied in a certain way. I put this question up to Mr. Edison himself once, and he replied that we should consider voltage as coming from, or acting in both directions, meaning by this, as between negative and positive. Voltage is a condition, the same as pressure in a steam boiler is a condition. Pressure in a steam boiler acts in all directions and so, presumably, does voltage. We say that the current flows from positive to negative, but some very eminent theoretical electricians are now claiming the exact opposite to be the case, and if you cut a pin hole in the back side of your lamp house, opposite the arc, and place a white screen from three to six feet away you will get an excellent image of the arc in reversed position (upside down) which you can study, and study will seem to indicate that the current, or the electrical action, really does flow from negative to positive. As I said in the beginning, it is a puzzling proposition, and one exceedingly difficult to understand. But this much we can affirm, though the editor himself once held differently, viz.: it makes no difference whatever, in practice, which wire the rheostat is placed on, either with a.c. or d.c.

More Meniscus-Bi-Convex Dope.

W. R. McPherson, chief operator, Mills Hippodrome, Minneapolis, Minnesota, writes as follows concerning meniscus-bi-convex lenses:

> In September 4th issue there is an article from Michigan in which it is said there is no real worth in the meniscus-bi-convex condenser combination, or, at least that opinion was expressed. I beg leave to differ with this proposition. From a long and personal experience in using different condensers I find that a pair of meniscus-bi-convex condensers of proper focal length will give a perfect light at all times, and will increase the screen illumination by 30 per cent., as against the plano-convex lenses. The superiority of the meniscus-bi-convex combination in light transmitting power is well worth the small difference in price, since less amperage can be used and still secure a brighter and clearer picture. I have tested these lenses under the most trying conditions, using both high and low amperage, the projectors being two Powers Six A. An ammeter was placed on the service line of each machine, which showed the amount of current consumed at the arc at all times. In conclusion allow me to again say that I beg leave to differ with our Michigan friend, and would by all means advise him to obtain a pair of meniscus-bi-convex condensers of proper focal length.

I am quoting these letters not to boost anybody's selling game, but simply for the reason that I regard this matter as of very large importance. I am firmly convinced that the introduction of these lenses will improve projection, but I am also firmly convinced that their introduction should be carefully undertaken, and that we have got to work out the exact combination to go with each objective lens much more carefully than we did with the plano lenses. It stands to reason that the meniscus-bi-convex is a much more sensitive animal than the old plano lenses were, and therefore the results of any error in focal length or placement will show up quicker and do more damage, but on the other hand, with proper focal length and proper placement the benefit ought to be, I think, correspondingly greater.

Classy House.

L. Rucker, Arkansas City, Kansas, sends a post card with three pictures thereon. I have cut the thing apart, rearranged it, and here it is. It is a pretty nice post card idea at that. One view gives the front of the theater, another the operating room, and the third the operator. Brother Rucker writes:

> The house, Rex theater, was opened April 30th. I thought maybe you would like to have a card of this kind. We have only one projector at present, but will put in another soon. The man holding the pole up is Yours Truly.

He Wants to Know.

Missouri writes:

> I operate a Powers Six on a 65-foot 4-inch throw, projecting a 9-foot picture, using a 4½ inch condenser lens, and a 1¼-inch objective lens, focal length 13 inches. Am I using the proper size condenser lenses? Is there any combination I can use to better my picture? It is very good now, but I want to know if I can improve it.

In the first place, my small-town brother, your data is very much mixed and decidedly twisted. If you are projecting a 9-foot picture at 65 feet you have approximately a 6¾ e. f. objective. I would suggest that you refer to article by Brother Griffths, page 430, July 18th issue, and match up your lenses according to the table he gives. I would also suggest that you by all means send $2 50 to the Moving Picture World for a Handbook. I think you have given the diameter of your lenses. I cannot make anything else out of it, and if that is a fact you most emphatically stand in need of the Handbook.

A Valuable Tool.

Recently the editor came into possession of a mighty slick little device put out by the Simplex Wire & Cable Company. I have been in correspondence trying to get them to supply me with several thousand, so that I could send them to my friends, but I fell down on that. The thing consists of a very neatly gotten up rectangle of celluloid, upon which is a revolving dial, and you have only to set the dial according to the simple directions printed thereon in order to automatically determine the size of wire to use for any distance with a given loss of voltage; to determine the volts lost of any size wire for a given amperage at a given distance; to determine the amperes that will cause a certain voltage drop at a given distance with a given size, or to determine the distance that will cause a certain voltage drop with a certain number of amperes on a given size wire. On the back is a table giving all the data concerning copper wire. And now I am going to tell all my friends how I think they can get one of these wiring computers free. Write to the Simplex Wire & Cable Company, 201 Devonshire Street, Boston, Mass., enclosing a self-addressed stamped envelope and merely ask them for one of their Simplex Wiring Computers. Now don't waste the company's time by writing a long rambling letter. Just say: "I have heard of your Simplex Wiring Computer and would feel very grateful if you would send me one in the enclosed stamped envelope," or words to that effect. I, of course, cannot guarantee that you will get one, but it is worth making a try for anyhow, because the thing is really a mighty fine little device, and works to perfection.

More Optical Dope.

John Griffiths, Ansonia, Connecticut, proceeds to stir the optical puddle with the following:

> With the object of increasing our knowledge of lens action, with your permission I will raise a point for discussion, viz.: What causes the spot on the shutter? According to Figure 6, page 358, April 18th issue, (Friend James' article) the spot on the shutter is caused by the objective ray which Professor Wall says is non-existent. The writer claims the spot on the shutter is no part of the main beam of light, but is entirely due to the reflection from the lamp house. Also that the bright rectangle of light shown in Brother James' article has nothing to do with the aperture, but is the image of the rectangular opening in the slide carrier, in support of which I offer the following: place a non-transparent slide in the slide carrier and move it half way over, so as to obstruct half the beam of light, and you will find that half the rectangle of light on the shutter has disappeared. Now remove this non-transparent slide and obstruct the light by half covering the aperture, and it will be found that the rectangle of light still maintains its complete outline, showing conclusively that the rectangle of light on the shutter is an image of the opening in the slide carrier, a fact which in itself goes a long way to prove that the spot on the shutter is simply reflected light being projected. One thing which puzzled the writer for some time was: How does the image get projected to the shutter at a point where the main beam of light converges to a point? To do so it must travel along different lines from the main beam. I remember that some time ago an operator called our attention to the fact that the lens of one machine could be put in focus while another machine was projecting a picture on the screen by placing a piece of transparent film at the aperture, a clear image appearing thereon by reflection from the picture being projected on the screen by the other machine. I note, also, that the reflected picture exactly fits the aperture. From the foregoing I conclude that there are what may be termed four true passages through a lens, that is, two each way. The main beam of light enters the lens in a converging beam, whereas reflected light converges before it reaches the lens and enters the same as a diverging beam, since otherwise the reflection from the curtain could not arrive at the aperture in the form it does, and thus we can account for two passages through the lens, and by reversing the lens we get the other two. Now if reflection from the curtain can be focused at the aperture, the reflection from the condensers can be focused at the shutter, the rays from the reflection being converged before entering the lens and emerging as a diverging beam, thus accounting for the size of the spot at a point where the main beam is converged to a point, or approximately to a point. If we remove the lens from the machine and look through it towards the lamp house, using a smoked glass at the aperture, the view is very similar to the spot on the shutter. By-the-way, I think there is a typographical error on page 1098, August 22nd issue, in Professor Wall's reply. About the middle of the column it reads: $\frac{1}{u} - \frac{1}{u} = \frac{1}{f}$. It should read $\frac{1}{v} - \frac{1}{u} = \frac{1}{f}$. And, by-the-way again, what happened to the diagram mentioned in the reply. So far as I can judge without it, the table I sent in agrees pretty well with Professor Wall, with the exception that we use a longer cone of light, thereby eliminating any chromatic aberration there might be.

Well, I got an awful slam for having the temerity to comment on Professor Wall's articles, however I am still alive and I am going to expose my ignorance once more. I cannot quite see how you make it four passages. It seems to me that the reflection which focuses at the aperture simply follows the same path taken by the out-going beam, or projecting beam. I do not see how it could possibly be otherwise, and, yet how can that be? The picture is, in this case, it seems to me, an original source of light, and as such sends out light rays in all directions therefore it would be absurd to assume that the rays from the picture focus before entering the lens. That, it seems to me, could not possibly be true. On second thought I guess I will crawl back into my hole, because I don't want to get a headache. As to the other matter, I do not exactly understand what you mean by "reflected light" unless it be that you intend to convey the idea that the light from the spot travels back, and is then reflected from the surface of the condenser through the aperture, thus forming the spot on the shutter. Well, if that is the idea it sounds plausible enough, and yet it hardly seems possible that there would be sufficient reflection to make so definite a spot, but perhaps I am misunderstanding you in this matter, so I will wait for further light.

St. Paul Organized.

A letter from Moving Picture Machine Operators' Protective Union, No. 356, St. Paul, Minnesota, says that the union instructed the secretary to inform the motion picture fraternity through the projection department, that the operators of St. Paul have organized and were chartered August 5th under the above title. The following officers were elected: Frank Eirler, president; E. R. Hoffman, vice-president; Walter J. Palmer, recording secretary; Al. Trezona, treasurer and business agent; Fred Miller, sergeant-at-arms.

The letter winds up with: "We have a dandy bunch of boys in the local. Everyone is striving to learn and improve himself in his profession, and to place the best possible results on the screen. Should the editor of the department ever wander this far West, local 356 will certainly be glad to receive a call."

I am glad to know that the St. Paul boys are organized. I lived for a little while in that city in 1884, up at what was then known as the "Five Points," at the foot of, if I remember rightly, Rose Hill. I am very much pleased that the St. Paul boys are striving to improve. I firmly believe in good working conditions and salaries for the operators, and I just as firmly believe in the operator delivering high-class results on the screen; those two particular things go hand in hand. My compliments to 356. May her shadow never grow less!

Lubricating First Runs.

J. E. Bauer, Beaumont, Texas, has sent to the editor a sample of a little device which is his own invention. It is designed to lubricate first run films so that the emulsion will not stick to the tension springs or shoes. As will be seen by the illustration, the device is simply a block of wood cut out in the center, or built up out of boards, with a hole the diameter of a large sperm candle in either side. In operation the candle is thrust into the hole (the side of the block should be at least ½ or ¾ of an inch thick in order to hold the candle firmly), and allowed to project inside just enough to reach out over the sprocket holes of the film. The opening in the block should be about 1/16 of an inch wider than the film. The block is fastened to the table between the rewinder heads and the film is passed under the candles, so that in rewinding the track of the film presses against the candles on the emulsion side, and is lubricated with sufficient tallow to prevent the emulsion adhering to the tension springs. Brother Bauer says he has been using the film waxer for five months and has no trouble at all in running first-run pictures. In fact, he says he sends them away in better condition than when they come to him. He also claims it does not make a bit of difference if the picture has only just been released; just run it through a waxer once and the tallow absorbed will prevent the emulsion sticking forever afterwards.

It seems to me that this device is a thoroughly practical contrivance and it has the advantage that any operator can readily make one for himself. Large candles, an inch or more in diameter, should be used, as they must be the same diameter throughout, or be trimmed until they are, since otherwise they would not slip through the holes. My compliments to Brother Bauer. I extend to him the thanks of the departmentities for contributing what looks to me like a very practical idea.

The same thing has been presented before, in another form, but this one particularly appeals to me by reason of its simplicity.

No, I Can't.

Lowell, Massachusetts, says:

> I am going to ask for information as follows: Passed my examination for moving picture operator's license last May, but have to wait until May 1, 1915, before being admitted to the union. Meanwhile I have an ambition, and that is to secure a motor drive license, and as there are no motor-driven machines in this city, can you suggest any means by which I could do this? Also, what causes carbons to break in the lamp house? We use 60 amperes a.c. with 5/8-inch cored carbons. Have filed the jaws, but to no purpose.

I am sorry, my brother, but I cannot suggest anything with regard to the motor drive license. As I understand the matter the idea of a separate motor drive license is not so much a fear of lack of knowledge of motors as it is that the authorities want to determine for themselves whether or not an applicant is a man who may be safely trusted with that kind of apparatus. That is to say, a man who is careful, and who will not say: "Let the motor do it," while he sits down and reads the paper, or steps outside of the operating room to chat with his best girl. As to the carbons, you will have to describe the trouble more definitely. Just where, how and when do the carbons break?

Mr. Ghost Again.

Winchester, Illinois, says his stereo is as clear as a bell, but there is a spot in the motion picture, only noticeable in a letter or clear film; which almost disappears at times, and then again is very plain. It is about half way from side to side, but down a little above the center. Is using a Standard machine; Fort Wayne compensarc at 40 amperes, the throw being 56 feet.

I think from what you say that your trouble most likely lies in the set of your carbons. Study carbon setting in the Handbook, a copy of which you have. It is possible your lens system is out of line, and that that is helping aggravate the trouble. See "Lining the Machine," page 228, Handbook.

Griffiths vs. Arkin.

John Griffiths, Ansonia, Connecticut, is here with the following:

> It was with much interest that I read the excellent article submitted by our friend, Mr. Arkin, of New York City. He most certainly deserves the thanks of all operators interested in projection optics, and to prove that I am interested I, for one, am going to offer criticism on his article, trusting it will be received in the same kindly spirit in which it is written.
> In the first place, let me say that there is bound to be wide divergence of opinion as to the correct size of picture for a given throw, since there are so many different shaped auditoriums. My own throw is 60 feet, but if I suggested to my manager that we ought to have a picture only 10½ feet wide he would most likely look at me real hard and inquire how many I had had, referring, of course, to marine matters, and, narrowing things down somewhat, to schooners. Friend Arkin, however, made provision for a large picture on a short throw, and the main point I am trying to bring out is that the whole article is based on theoretical geometrical optics, which need a little adjusting before being put into practice. Referring to friend Arkin's diagram, Fig. 4, page 185, October 10th issue, proceed to calculate the size of the spot at the aperture, and the calculation will show why geometrical optics fail in practice. Taking the figures of Arkin in case 2: $F = 20.5$; $F_1 = 5.9$; slide carrier opening 3 6/16, then 20.5 : 3 6/16 :: 5.9 : X, where X is size of spot at aperture. 36/16 = 3.375, which multiplied by $5.9 = 19.9$, and this divided by 20.5 gives us .92, or a spot at the aperture less than one inch in diameter. Now how in Gehenna are we going to get a clear field on the screen with a spot of that size when the diagonal of the aperture is 1.13 inches and the .92 inch spot includes the outer rays, which are heavily charged with color due to the chromatic aberration of the condensing lenses? Whatever move we make to enlarge the spot, whether by advancing the arc or the whole lamp house, or by changing condensers, the rays cease to have their virtual focus at the center of the lens tube. Still the fault is not due to the theory of optics, but to the appliances we use. If, for instance, we were to use a corrected set of condensers having a diameter of say, 6 inches, then I believe the theory would work out in practice. It is interesting to note that the relative distances obtained by friend Arkin between the condensers and film are approximately the same that I, myself, obtained for my own table (page 430, July 18th issue), although they were arrived at by an entirely different system. In computing my table I only took into account the condensers most readily procurable by operators. In concluding I wish again to thank Mr. Arkin for his efforts in our behalf. I am in a position to appreciate the great amount of work involved in producing his article, and since he is not an operator, but an optician, I again say that, notwithstanding certain faults in the aforesaid article, Arkin has nevertheless added to our knowledge, and is, therefore, entitled to the sincere thanks of all operators.

Brother Griffiths sent with his comment a rough sketch designed to illustrate the size of the spot under brother Arkin's method computation, but I hardly think the expense of making a cut would be justified, since the matter is perfectly clear without it. I am particularly pleased in one thing. Not long ago in a private letter from a professor of optics I was told that in my comments I displayed ignorance of geometrical optics. I replied saying that while I had a fair understanding of plain geometrical optics, still I did not think they applied, or could be applied successfully to the problems found in a projection system, whereupon I got another terrific calling down and was told, among other things, that I did not know straight-up. Well, at least if that is true brother Griffiths also don't know "straight-up," and I think before the matter is finally settled the gentleman in question will find that we are going to arrive at the result we are looking for, whether we know anything or not, and that it won't be done by applying hard and fast geometrical optics to the problems of projection either. That, in my judgment, is where the optician fails when he comes to consider optics as applied to projection. I long ago suggested, and I now repeat, that the accepted rules won't, don't and never will work out when applied to a projection machine system without modification. If I am wrong, all right, but I have nailed my flag to the mast on that particular proposition, and I have used twenty-penny spikes to do it. Brother Arkin made another error. In some instances he selected lenses of focal length, which it would be almost impossible for the operator to obtain: 6½ and 7½-inch lenses have been the standard from which, up to a year ago, there was almost no variation. Of late, however, due, I think, largely to the various articles in this department, there has been a considerable demand for 8½, 9 and 9½ lenses, but anything shorter than a 6½ would be very hard to secure. I presume they could be had from the Kleine Optical Company or the Bausch & Lomb people, but I doubt if any ordinary dealer carries them in stock, and, moreover, I doubt the desirability of a combination having a rear lens of less than 6½ inches, since this would heavily increase the lens curvature and set up a correspondingly greater spherical aberration. I trust that brother Arkin will understand that these criticisms are offered in good faith, and without any desire either on my part or on the part of brother Griffiths to belittle or detract from the valuable work he has done. It is rather surprising that a man who is not an actual operator should have come as close to hitting it right as he did, and, like Griffiths, I believe all operators owe friend Arkin a vote of thanks.

Duluth Trouble.

It seems that there is trouble between Thomas Furniss, manager of the Rex and Lyric theaters, Duluth, Minn., and the Moving Picture Machine Operators Union No. 32 of that city. The editor is in receipt of a letter from a member of the Duluth Union, asking him to publish certain newspaper clippings, the same being a statement by the union, a reply by Furniss, and a newspaper article, in the department.

Now, this would be inadvisable, I think, first, because it would not do any good, second, because it would only embitter the struggle, third, because it is purely a local matter, and fourth, because it would take up at least a full page of valuable space to no purpose. I shall, therefore, confine this matter to calling the attention of manager Furniss and the Duluth Union to the fact that in this fight energy is being wasted which might be put to other and far better uses. Mr. Furniss in his statement says the president and the business manager of the Duluth Union are both employes of another theater and that the balance of the union is composed of a bunch of young boys. Mr. Furniss goes on to say that he "believes in union labor" and stands ready at any moment to employ union operators when fair and square men are at the head of the union, and its members are competent, trustworthy men.

Now, Mr. Furniss, even assuming that your estimate of the members of the union is correct, which I take the liberty of doubting, how do you ever in this world expect to get the opportunity of dealing with a union "composed of high-class, trustworthy men," unless you are only willing to pay more than the very low wage the Duluth operators receive? Do you expect to get the class of men you are talking about unless you hold out financial inducements sufficient to attract that kind of men to the business of operating? Well, Mr. Furniss, if you do, then you are likely to keep right on "expecting" for a good while to come. Possibly there is material in the Duluth Operators' Union which is not all that could be desired. I don't know, but if there is, I venture the assertion, that this is due wholly, solely and entirely to the fact that Duluth operators have received low pay, and therefore men of real ability—the trustworthy men you are talking about—have very naturally sought employment where their trustworthiness, etc., would be recognized in some other form than words, which don't pay the grocer's bills or put shoes on the kiddies' feet.

I would suggest to friend Furniss that, up to say twenty-five dollars a week, the manager has no legitimate kick coming on any wage demand the union may make, because in this day of high living, even in a small city like Duluth, twenty-five dollars is as little as any manager can expect to secure really competent, trustworthy men for, who would not only be capable of, but willing to deliver high-class work on the screen of his theater. That proposition is just plain, ordinary, horse sense, and you will find that, while the process is somewhat slow, an increase in salary and a betterment of working conditions will operate to raise the Duluth operators to a higher plane, just as it has done elsewhere. But I want to say this: You cannot expect really satisfactory results until you do something radical. I mean by this that real ability does not have to work for a song, and, as a general proposition, it don't either. When you make salaries such that operating will not only be attractive to the boy and the ex-truck driver, but also to the high-class man of brains and ability, then you will get real results, because Mr. Ex-T. D. and the boy won't stand any show against the other fellow. As it is now the man of brains and real ability laughs when you suggest moving picture operating at fifteen to twenty dollars a week. Do I make the matter clear? and doesn't what I've said sound like good logic? Think it over, Mr. Furniss, and other managers who talk loudly about wanting good men, but who seek them at poor man salaries.

Repairing Guil Pastil.

R. G. Kittel, Weaubleau, Missouri, sets forth the following interesting matter concerning guil pastil.

> As guil pastil seems to be of much interest to gas users, I will tell more of my experience with it. Am still using the first one I bought, though I fully expected to have to throw it away some time ago. In fact I cracked it wide open through the middle, and presumed it was ruined, but, while waiting for the new one I ordered to come, not wishing to go back to the old lime, with its much weaker light, I took some soft asbestos (Brother Kittel means the asbestos wicking or engine packing, which can be bought at any hardware store.—Ed.) and wrapped some of it all around the outside of the pastil, as per Figure 1. I then wrapped some soft wrapping wire, such as jewelers use, > around the asbestos, which holds the pencil solidly together, and, the wrapping being soft, protects it just as does the cotton the pencil is shipped in. I next made a clamp, like X, Fig. 2, out of iron, though a heavy piece of tin would answer just as well, and pushed this down over the pencil and the holder which I bought with the pencil. This holds the pencil solid and safe. It cannot fall off or get cracked or broken, and as the pencils are very easily damaged it is a distinct advantage. By this plan they will last as long as there is any pencil left, and the light is not affected, even though the pencil be split or cracked many ways. I can therefore recommend that this plan be adopted with a new pencil, purely as a matter of protection to it. By its use one is enabled to turn off the gas without having to be so careful about it. I now turn off my gas the same as I did when I was using limes. The heat will burn off the wire, and wrapping as fast as the pencil is consumed, so that all one needs to do is to smooth the surface of the pencil with a piece of paper. Not even sandpaper is really necessary, since the pencil is very soft. Figure 3 shows a view of the clamp. I bend the ends so as to fit around the holder of the pencil. I would advise the salesman of guil pastil to make a holder such as this, and to sell it with the pastil, as it would be a great help to users. As a matter of fact the pencils ought really to be wrapped before they are ever used at all. Those who can make use of my idea are welcome to it. With this improvement I can safely say that guil pastil is the best thing made for calcium light, even in the item of lasting quality.

It seems to me that here is a matter of very large value to gas users. The only complaint against guil pastil has been the extremely fragile nature of the animal. As one user very aptly put it: "It certainly gives the light all right, but the darned thing breaks if you look at it real hard." Now, if Brother Kittel's idea works out, and it seems to me like it could not do otherwise if the wrapping is consumed by the heat, as he says it is, that this holder will overcome the difficulty complained of, and allow the user to get the full benefit of the pastil by exercising just about the same care he would with a lime. I am sure gas users will be grateful to Friend Kittel for his contribution which I strongly advise them to try out. The illustrations seem to make the matter clear, except Fig. 3. I am not quite sure about your idea there, though I think you mean that you bend band X down over the back end of the pastil in the form of a flange. I did not reproduce Fig. 3 because it could not be understood.

That Answer Book.

F. W. Van Horne, Williamsport, Pennsylvania, writes:

> Your letter received and I thank you very much for giving my suggestion the attention you have. I think that your stand is well taken, but at the same time there is another side to the question. Now, I do not think that a person merely trying to pass an examination would go to the trouble to learn these answers. If he did try to do that, he would soon either become discouraged and quit, or else become so interested that he would study them in earnest, and thus be well started on his way to become a real operator. No embryo operator, as you can them, would be willing to put in the time necessary to learn such a book by heart, and he would either have to do that or study out the real meaning of the answers for himself if he wanted to pass an examination. It would also hit the so-called "schools," because there would be a book on the market which would give the same things they profess to teach, and it would give them in a manner that would make the would-be operator work in order to master its contents. I hope others will see the matter as I do.

Well, it takes more than one drop of water to make a bucketful. Let us hear from the rest of you. This is all the comment I care to make at this time. If the majority seem to think that the publication would be advisable I might consider it; not otherwise.

Pretty Slides and a Good Stunt.

C. W. Epps, Star theater, Mineola, Texas, writes:

> Here I am with an answer to question 51. (Which unfortunately came too late for consideration. Ed.) I note in September 26th issue you have one on the Roll of Honor which you say was typewritten with a purple ribbon on white paper with the name omitted. Question No. 45. I guess probably that might have been me.
> Some time ago I had considerable fun with my camera. I went around town and took pictures of some of our pretty babies, and of our lakes and other interesting things. When I had finished I made them up in lantern slides and ran them that night. We had a good house and everyone was highly pleased. Any operator not over-burdened with work, and who is the proud possessor of a Kodak, can have a good deal of amusement by emulating my example; also he can make some money. I made over twenty-five dollars the night I did this, and did not in the least slight my work either. Slides are not hard to make, and to everyone having ideas similar to mine it is a pleasure to make them. I do not mount the slides, as they are usually run only once, and by careful handling they will not get soiled or scratched.

Brother Epps sent several of the slides. They are very clear and would undoubtedly project beautifully; moreover, he had colored them, and though this was done somewhat crudely, still I have no doubt but that the effect is good. He says he "made twenty-five dollars," but does not tell how he did it. Presumably, however, he took orders for copies of the photographs. I would suggest that many theater managers or operators could work this in to good purpose. Imagine what a hit it would make with a mother to have a picture of her baby flashed on the screen of the local theater. Why, she would not get through talking about that theater for weeks, and she probably would be there with her hair in two distinct braids pretty regularly thereafter. Also, if it were known that there would be an occasional stunt of this kind pulled off I have no doubt but it would add to the drawing power of the theater, and add very materially, too.

Comments on the Films

SHORTY (Edison), Nov. 3.—A thrilling release, written by J. A. Dorward and splendidly produced by Ashley Miller, featuring Yale Boss in the character of Shorty. Chas. Sutton, as Pete, and Bessie Learn deserve special mention, in fact all members of the cast are perfect types of the characters they portray (dock pirates and wharf rats). The various scenes contain much suspense. Shorty frustrates the gang, of which he is a member, by a clever ruse and becomes a hero. This is an enticing offering.

FIRES OF FATE (Essanay), Nov. 3.—Adapted from Munsey Magazine. Richard C. Travers and Ruth Stonehouse are featured, and both are called upon to accomplish some strenuous physical acts, as well as strong emotional work. A superior hotel fire scene and a hazardous rescue scene, several stories above the street, are most taking punches. The ending is most satisfactory. The director has done his work well in all respects.

LIZZIE, THE LIFE SAVER (Kalem), Nov. 3.—Director Marshal Neilan has produced a very laughable comedy, featuring Ruth Roland, Lloyd V. Hamilton and himself. The principal scenes take place in and on the water at a summer resort. Those that enjoy a good laugh will be gratified by sitting through this picture.

A BOOMERANG SWINDLE (Lubin), Nov. 3.—Frank C. Griffin has written a very laughable and original comedy, which J. Frank Glendon, Francis Ne Moyer, Ed Lawrence, Harry Loraine and C. W. Ritchie most ably portray. In the plot two professional swindlers in an attempt to bunco a farmer have the tables turned on them, and beside losing all their money succeed in breaking into jail. How it is all accomplished is very interesting and laughable.

THE TELLTALE KNIFE (Selig), Nov. 3.—A typical western melodrama of a most lurid type, involving cattle rustlers, ranchmen, the sheriff and his posse, etc., in scenes of shooting, fighting, hard riding and love making. There is not very much in it of an original nature. It is a replica of the old-fashioned releases.

JENKS AND THE JANITOR (Edison), Nov. 4.—A loud suit of clothes is the principal disturber of domestic happiness in this comedy. It is hardly conceivable that so many misunderstandings and laughable situations could be got out of a new suit of a pronounced pattern. The cast, headed by Edward O'Connor and Dan Mason, ably portray their various characters splendidly, eliminating all horseplay. The audience greeted this picture with laughter.

BUSTER BROWN PICKS OUT THE COSTUMES (Edison), Nov. 4.—On the same reel with the above. This Outcault comedy, under the direction of Charles H. France, is much superior to the last two or three preceding it; even Tige and the goat display more ginger. This comedy is worth seeing.

THE FABLE OF HOW UNCLE BREWSTER WAS TOO SHIFTY FOR THE TEMPTER (Essanay), Nov. 4.—In this George Ade shows how those there "gosh dawrn" city chaps couldn't put anything over on Uncle Brewster (Frank Owens). It is funny to see how he cut down on his expenses and filled up at a fruit exhibit. The hotel at which he stopped was money out and Uncle was plus on towels, which he brought as souvenirs to Aunt Mahaly. Moral: Some People are Good Because it Comes High to be Otherwise. Amusing throughout.

"C. D." (Selig), Nov. 4.—A story of the Civil War, with a somewhat trite plot concerning a Northern Spy who falls in love with a Southern Girl. There are several quite thrilling scenes. The costuming in some instances is far in advance of the period; carelessness has been shown in this respect. Some intensity and suspense prevails and it succeeds in being about an ordinary release.

THE EVOLUTION OF PERCIVAL (Vitagraph), Nov. 4.—A very laughable comedy in which is used the old antiquated idea of the fellow behind the curtain, with a mallet, who delivers the knockout blow. Billy Quirk and Constance Talmadge are featured. The ring scene is productive of continuous laughter, as are the closing scenes, wherein Percival, formerly a timid and effeminate youth, after his victory in the ring, becomes a regular "tough un." A comedy of merit.

BUTTERFLIES AND ORANGE BLOSSOMS (Biograph), Nov. 5.—Quite an interesting comedy, concerning a young naturalist and a beautiful young heiress, whose mothers are old friends and anxious for the scions of the different families to meet and become deeply interested in each other. The desires of the parents are accomplished in the final scenes. The young people accidentally meet, with the assistance of an old mammy laundress, fall in love and surprise themselves as well as the two scheming mammas. An interesting and laughable comedy.

SLIPPERY SLIM AND THE IMPERSONATOR (Essanay), Nov. 5.—Another love episode occurring between Slippery Slim and Mustang Pete, rivals for the hand of Sophie Clutts. The strenuous complications which occur during the unfolding of the plot, especially in the last scenes, are very laughable.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 72 (Selig), Nov. 5.—A number of highly interesting domestic events are presented, covering almost the whole world, which must be seen to be appreciated. Then comes scenes from the theater of the European war, showing the ruins of various cities in Belgium and France after being bombarded, scenes on the battlefields, in the trenches, etc.

THE CHOICE (Vitagraph), Nov. 5.—A most interesting visualization, demonstrating the different methods utilized by smugglers of opium into the United States. The picture demonstrates how a young revenue officer, who is assigned by his superior to land the depredators, does it and involves himself in a love episode. It is thrilling, combined with intensity. A most pleasing surprise is sprung upon the audience at the very end of the closing scene. Guernsey Fraser is the author and Ulysses Davis is the director, Myrtle Gonzales, Wm. Duncan, Jack Moore and Alfred Vosburgh, the principals in the cast, merit special mention. A strong release.

A REGULAR RIP (Biograph), Nov. 6.—On the same reel with "Getting the Sack." A sort of a travesty, as the caption would indicate, on "Rip Van Winkle," which as a laughing feature is very commendable. The cast is made up of Florence Lee, Walter Coyle, Clarence Barr and Louise Owen, all of whom do creditable work. It is provocative of much laughter.

GETTING THE SACK (Biograph), Nov. 6.—On the same reel with "A Regular Rip." A comedy of complications, including an irate father, a couple of burglars, a pair of lovers and a sack, which is very deceptive. A minister gets mixed up in the mix. Quite a laughable mixture.

THE INDIAN SUFFRAGETTES (Kalem), Nov. 6—An Indian farce comedy which is a travesty on the suffragist movement of their pale-face sisters. It is a decided departure from the usual Princess Mona Darkfeather's series and very original in conception. Dishwater (Princess Mona), returns from the East to the Oompah tribe, a militant suffragette and instills her belief into her red sisters with an umbrella and also convinces the braves, with the same weapon, that they must take a back seat. It is very interesting to see how, in the final scenes, she does not win out. Very comical.

LOVE TRIUMPHS (Lubin), Nov. 6.—An interesting story written by Olive H. Lee, in which Harry C. Myers plays the leading part and directs the company. Rosemary Theby cleverly portrays a dual role, which demands a great amount of emotional work. Brinsley Shaw and Bartley McCullum ably support in strong principal characters. There is much sustained interest in the scenes and the acting and photography are exceptional.

NO WEDDING BELLS FOR HER (Selig), Nov. 6.—A comedy burlesque by W. E. Wing. An extravagant array of scenes which eat up one thousand feet of film to demonstrate how the awful villain was foiled. The director, Norval MacGregor, with Lyllian Brown Leighton, John Lancaster, Lee Morris and Helen Castle make of this offering a hilariously funny burlesque.

THANKS FOR THE LOBSTER (Vitagraph), Nov. 6.—A farcical comedy written by Roy L. McCardell, in which Wally Van is featured as Von Blotz, Professor of the Terpsichorean Art. He introduces some wonderful dancing at Murphey's Jardin De Danse—upstairs, downstairs, upside down, on the ceiling, out of the window, etc.—then he wakes up. He wins the booby prize, entitled "A Living Likeness"—a live lobster. Several other things occur, which keeps the audience laughing continually.

THE DOLE OF DESTINY (Biograph), Nov. 7.—A picture drama with a pastoral flavor. One is reminded of the old Biograph productions by seeing so many familiar faces in the cast. It is a picture that contains interest and suspense in its many scenes, which are finely photographed. The acting is all that could be desired. A gratifying number.

GETTING TO THE BALL GAME (Edison), Nov. 7.—A comedy depicting how a baseball fan (Arthur Housman) encountered all sorts of trouble in attempting to get to a baseball game. This picture is especially interesting from the fact that the scenes on the diamond are actual, taken during the game between Pittsburgh and New York National teams—the game which put the New York Giants out of the running for the 1914 pennant. Yale Benner deserves mention for his characterization of an "old residenter."

BRONCHO BILLY'S MISSION (Essanay), Nov. 7.—An Anderson western drama in which Broncho figures as an outlaw, but in the latter scenes he redeems himself, through a dramatic incident, and finishes as the hero. As is usual, in Mr. Anderson's productions, there is a fine display of scenery and good photography. It is a commendable offering.

THE MAN IN THE VAULT (Kalem), Nov. 7.—A modern picture drama featuring Anna Nilsson and Guy Coombs. There are quite a number of intense scenes pertaining involving parental love. The theme of the plot of this number is not as wholesome as it might be, but in the later scenes, sacrifices made by a father and son, who are master cracksmen, for the love of each other, tend to a redeeming quality at the ending. It is well acted and photographed.

KIDNAPPING THE KID (Lubin), Nov. 7.—A farce comedy written by Epes Winthrop Sargent, evidently to exploit Babe Hardy in the character of a young kid, who is kidnapped by a couple of curb stone musicians. They have an awful time and are eventually glad to get rid of him. J. A. Murphy has worked up the funny situations cleverly. On the same reel with "The Honor of the Force."

THE HONOR OF THE FORCE (Lubin), Nov. 7.—On the same reel with "Kidnapping the Kid." A slap-stick comedy which is more acrobatic than anything else, concerning a street gang and comedy police force. A horseplay effort.

THE LOSING FIGHT (Selig), Nov. 7.—The scenes of this story, laid in a fishing village, are very realistic and have been clearly photographed. The various parts are portrayed by Kathlyn Williams, Charles Clary, Wheeler Oakman and Frank Clark skillfully. Collin Campbell is the author and producer. This is a most interesting picture.

A BETTER UNDERSTANDING (Biograph), Nov. 9.—A picture drama that contains very little that is absolutely interesting to the spectator. The plot, while evidently intended to be of a convincing quality, is vapid and filled with inconsistencies. The general tone of this release is lacking in a moral sense and not up to this company's usual standard. The acting and photography are deserving of mention.

WITH SLIGHT VARIATIONS (Edison), Nov. 9.—A farcical comedy by E. H. Geissinger, directed by Charles Ranson, featuring William Wadsworth. A display of long drawn out absurdities rather than comedy, and it fails to hit the mark as a laugh creator. Little can be said in its favor.

SWEEDIE THE TROUBLE MAKER (Essanay), Nov. 9.—In this comedy Sweedie has two admirers and her mind is so fickle that she is unable to decide between them. Her parents determine on one and, of course, she detrmines on the other. Several funny complications occur, and when they try to force Sweedie to the wall she clears out the whole family, including the police, who have been called in. Considerable horseplay is introduced, but it is amusing.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 73 (Selig), Nov. 9.—Seven large truck loads of Christmas presents, being shipped from Los Angeles to children in the European war zone, by the Millionaire's club of that city; Longfellow's home and the ceremonies dedicating it as a monument to the poet, including scenes of the interior, principal among which is the room in which he was born; the razing of twin chimneys left standing among the ruins caused by the Salem, Mass., fire. War scenes, showing crack Canadian troops disembarking in England; huge traction trucks conveying baggage of the soldiers through the streets of London, on their way to the camp at Salisbury Plain; also quite a number of scenes at the front.

MISS TOMBOY AND FRECKLES (Vitagraph), Nov. 9.—A comedy which requires Miss Lillian Walker, who is featured to do several strenuous stunts, which she succeeds in accomplishing gracefully. She is most ably assisted by William Bletcher. The backgrounds, especially the exteriors, are very attractive. An old-fashioned barn dance is a most pleasing feature and, taken all in all, this picture is a charming one.

MASKS AND FACES (Biograph), Nov. 3.—A two-part production, adapted from Charles Reade's noted novel, entitled "Peg Woffington." Strong dramatic work is necessary to bring out the points in this offering, and those who have the various leading characters in hand do full justice to the author's conception; the scenic effects, photography and costuming are perfect. Alan Hale, Vola Smith, Edward Cecil, Gretchen Hartman, A. C. Marston and Jack Drumier are the principals. A noteworthy production.

ON THE STROKE OF FIVE (Vitagraph), Nov. 3.—A special feature in two parts, which is splendidly acted and produced by a star cast, directed by Captain Harry Lambert. The embellishments of this picture are more than ordinarily lavish and it seems too bad to waste so much talent and expenditure on a plot of morbid construction. Naomi Childers does some very strong work in the character of the adventuress, who eventually pays the price of her machinations.

THE PRISON STAIN (Kalem), Nov. 4.—A two-act modern picture drama, featuring Marin Sais, supported by Paul Hurst, Frank Jonasson and Wm. West. It is a story with the opening scenes located in a prison and concerns the struggles, after their discharge, of two ex-convicts. There is much intensity existing throughout the two acts. After much suspense all ends happily. The acting of the principals is highly commendable, and those who have minor roles deserve credit for their work. A very satisfactory visualization.

THE SORCERESS (Lubin), Nov. 4.—While this two-part picture is written by the popular author, Clay M. Greene, and Joseph W. Smiley has produced it with lavish accessories, the theme and the plot are not deserving of commendation, inclining throughout to pruriency. The actors in the cast do full justice to their parts and the photography is almost faultless.

THE STOLEN YACHT (Lubin), Nov. 5.—A two-reel picture play by Marc Edmund Jones, produced by Paul Powell. A picture of complications, to which the spectator must give his utmost attention in order to understand the plot. Bribery and intrigue are involved, also considerable crookedness, but eventually, after several strenuous scenes the ending is satisfactory. The acting is commendable and the marine scenes are interesting and well photographed.

THE PINES OF LOREY (Edison), Nov. 6.—A two-part drama written by J. A. Mitchell and produced by Ashley Miller, featuring Marc MacDermott and Miriam Nesbitt, supported by a strong cast of leading Edison actors. This picturization contains many scenes of a thrilling nature which have been beautifully photographed. There is considerable mystery pertaining, which holds the interest of the audience to the termination. A satisfying production in all respects.

HIS DEAREST FOES (Essanay), Nov. 6.—A two-act dramatic picture adapted from a Munsey Magazine story, with the scenes laid in an English garrison in India, the principal characters being composed of officers in the English army and natives, including an Indian Rajah. The dissolute son of the English commander is the cause of all the trouble depicted in this picture. There is lack of convincing quality in the last scenes of this visualization.

THE LAND OF ARCADIA (Vitagraph), Nov. 7.—The basis of this two-part picture is the theory that the ideal way of raising children is to isolate them from the world. Most of the scenes take place on Arcadia island, illustrating the primitive manner of life a father has adopted for the purpose of rearing his children in an atmosphere of simplicity. The cast is made up of leading Vitagraph actors supporting Lillian Walker, and the acting is all well done. There is a strong comparison drawn between the artificialities of the city and the simple life of seclusion. A number worth viewing.

THE RIDDLE OF THE GREEN UMBRELLA (Kalem), Nov. 9.—This two-part pictureplay has been reviewed at length, by Hanford C. Judson, in the Moving Picture World, and can be found on page 655, issue of Oct. 31, 1914.

WHEN HIS SHIP CAME IN (Selig), Nov. 9.—A two-reel sea drama, featuring Bessie Eyton and Thomas Santschi. There are some beautiful marine scenes shown in the action of this picture and the photography has been cleverly done. As far as the plot is concerned not much can be said in its favor. The acting is adequate.

Independent

MUTUAL WEEKLY, No. 97.—Nov. 5.—Interesting war scenes, the president and supreme court at opening of Bar Association, new mint at Washington, manufacture of stamps, and of a dozen twilight sleep babies are included in this number.

THE CHASM (Thanhouser), Nov. 6.—A very fair offering with beautifully made scenes, though the acting, while also fair, is not really strong. It is a mental chasm referred to and lies between a girl and her father. She had met a burglar who had come to rob the house. Repentance had made him write to her father, saying that he would return the things taken on promise; that he could come with them safely. The father promised, but then notified the police and the young man was arrested and spent his time in jail. This is not one of the strongest situations.

WHEN VICE SHUDDERED (Princess), Nov. 6.—The janitor saves the bank cashier from looting the bank vault. The fact that convenient burglars had been there helps cover the tracks of the cashier's embezzlement and apparently he goes scot free. The story is not strong and there is not much convincing realism in the scenes; but there is much prettiness in the picture and the players are pleasing.

TWO PALS AND A GAL (Joker), Nov. 7.—Two bad men breeze into a Western town and try to win the widow who runs the local restaurant. She and the lawyer next door have been secretly married and between them they get all of the visitors' money. The sub-titles are in verse. This is well photographed and makes fairly good entertainment of a burlesque type.

KEEPING A HUSBAND (Thanhouser), Nov. 8.—A domestic problem is presented in this number when the pretty young girl attracts the elderly married man. His wife pretends to be a sleepwalker and intrudes upon them, bringing the husband to his senses. This is handled with a fair degree of interest. Some of the photography is not very clear.

ETHEL'S ROOF PARTY (Komic), Nov. 8.—Another of the "Bill" series in which the girl stenographer gives a luncheon on the roof. The boys start a fire scare. This is not quite so funny as some of this series, but serves to hold the interest very well. The photography is particularly good.

THE WIDOW'S CHILDREN (Reliance), Nov. 9.—The party of surveyors are chased away by the angry widow with a shotgun because they wish to move her barn off the right-of-way. They set fire to the barn and later the chief engineer rescues a child and wins the widow's heart. This makes a story of about average interest. The fire scene was well put on.

HIS TALENTED WIFE (Keystone), Nov. 9.—A burlesque theatrical number in which Mack Sennet takes part. During the performance some money is stolen and a chase follows. The humor of this is not very strong. The photography is good.

AN ILL WIND (Sterling), Nov. 9.—An eccentric number with some quite amusing situations in it. The chief of police becomes locked in a clothes box in the girl's room and is given a wild ride inside it. The photography is good and this succeeds very well for an old type of film story.

MUTUAL GIRL, No. 43 (Reliance), Nov. 9.—John W. Grey is finishing the Mutual Girl series both as author and producer. He has introduced a bit of life in them and this number is a self-sufficing melodrama in which Norma saves the silk mills of her sweetheart from a scheming superintendent. It happens that she looks exactly like the woman overseer—there are several double exposures in the picture and in one, the heroine is made to cross in front of herself and there is no hint of camera manipulation. It will interest.

THE TWO THIEVES (Nestor), Nov. 10.—In this number Murdock MacQuarrie plays the part of a safe cracker who enters a bank and discovers the cashier dead on the floor. A note left for the wife indicates it was a case of suicide because of short accounts. The thief destroys the note, ruins the cashier's book and arranges things so that the wife thinks her husband died a hero trying to save the bank from robbery. A unique plot, well presented and convincing.

THE NIGGARD (Majestic), Nov. 10.—A one-reel sermon that fails to get over strongly and perhaps chiefly because there is something irritating in the weakness of its hero that locks the door on sympathy. The clerk has money to pay the last installment on his home, occupied by his old mother and himself; but meeting a fellow clerk and two girls is "forced" to treat in order to show that he really is no tightwad. The result is that he and his mother are sold out of their home. It has well made scenes and is well acted.

THE LIFE SAVERS (Crystal), Nov. 10.—Hans and Fritz pretend to be life savers, though neither can swim. They also pass themselves off as Counts Snuff and Sniff. This low comedy has occasional humorous spots in it, though the plot is not strong.

MOTHERHOOD (Beauty), Nov. 10.—A story of approaching maternity, handled in a delicate way. The young wife does not want her child and has numerous fearful visions, but at last her love overpowers them all. This symbolic reel is quite entertaining in its way. The opening scenes in particular are very beautiful and the photography exceptionally good. Marguerita Fisher and Harry Pollard are the young couple and Kathie Fisher appears as Cupid.

AN INCOMPETENT HERO (Keystone), Nov. 12.—Fatty flirts with a married woman across the way. Later, when a burglar appears he crosses a rope into her room. A rough-house ensues with some laughable moments in it. This is well photographed throughout.

THE DOG RAFFLES (Sterling), Nov. 12.—The dog's master, being out of food and money, teaches the animal to invade other people's rooms and steal. All goes well till the dog picks up a lighted bomb and then a wild chase results. This is well pictured and makes a fairly amusing number.

THE SHOEMAKER'S ELEVENTH (Victor), Nov. 12.—A unique little story, featuring Ben Wilson as a shoemaker. He has a wife and ten children. He tries to leave one on a doorstep and the police send him home with two, one baby being left by a young mother. The picture of the numerous children asleep is certainly amusing. Happiness results upon the discovery that the eleventh child has a thousand dollars pinned to it.

HER OWN HOME (Eclair), Nov. 15.—A prettily pictured comedy number in which a young girl finds her home sold out from under her after her father's death. She goes to the city but later returns to the old home disguised as an elderly woman. She of course marries her employer. A nice comedy idea quite well worked out. Lottye Fowler and Fred Sumner are in the cast.

LIZZIE'S ESCAPE (L. K. O.), Nov. 15.—A short reel comic, showing the adventures of a country girl with a couple of city ginks, the latter played enjoyably by Henry Lehrmann and Billy Ritchie. The girl has her money taken from her in the back end of a saloon and it has various adventures before she recovers it. Low comedy that will cause some laughter.

THE PHANTOM CRACKSMAN (Victor), Nov. 16.—Charles Ogle plays the part of a millionaire whose house is robbed by the mysterious cracksman. He joins the detective force and determines to find the guilty one. The manner in which he recognizes the woman, portrayed by Mary Fuller, is interesting and presented with spirit. The denouement, in which the girl is shot through a curtain may disappoint some observers, but it is perhaps the logical ending.

BEAR ESCAPE (Sterling), Nov. 16.—A boy and girl story, in which one of the lads makes up as a bear. A real bear chases him up a tree. This situation affords quite a little amusement. It turns out that the real bear is tame and eats sugar from the girl's hand. This should interest children.

O! YOU MUMMY! (Crystal), Nov. 17.—Prof. Diggup receives a mummy and the young folks dress up Pearl White to take its place. The professor thinks his mummy has come to life and there is a wild chase after it. Fairly amusing.

NAUGHTY NELLIE (Crystal), Nov. 17.—On same reel with above. The girl pretends to take carbolic acid because her father refuses consent to her marriage. The doctor gives her an emetic. This is an average comedy.

HIS NIGHT OUT (Joker), Nov. 18.—The girl's father dismisses her lover, saying he wants his daughter to wed a man of force. The lover becomes intoxicated and dreams he is a cave man, numerous scenes being shown in which the characters wear skins and fight with clubs. Later the lover invades his sweetheart's home and drags her out of bed to be married. The humor in this is a little coarse and does not get over strongly.

CUPID AND THE FISHES (Imp), Nov. 19.—This is the tenth of the Universal Boy series. Matty watches the life savers in practice work and later goes out with the fishermen to see the nets hauled. This does not contain much plot, but the scenes have a certain educational interest.

A SCENARIO WRITER'S DREAM (Imp), Nov. 20.—Howland Rant, a temperamental director, orders a scenario writer to turn out a strong war production. The result is amazing. First airships are shown in destructive work and later the inventor brings them down by a machine which shoots bolts of lightning. The photography is none too clear in some places but the ingeniously devised studio scenes hold the interest strongly.

WHEN THE BRIDES GOT MIXED (Nestor), Nov. 20.—A farcical offering in which two young married couples go to a hotel and become mixed up. They are finally arrested by the hotel detective who thinks they are crooks. The cast is a pleasing one, but the situations in the story are not particularly new.

THE BATTLE OF THE NATIONS (Joker), Nov. 21.—The characters in this are three Frenchmen, three Germans and various other national types. All get into a row and wind up by marrying girls of different nations. A play upon the present war situation in Europe. The humor is not very strong and the plot not of much consequence.

CUPID'S PRANKS (Pathe).—A farcical auto-elopement romance that will make fun for the spectators. It is all old stuff; but it has been done with liveliness and speed and will be liked.

A HARVEST ROMANCE (Warner's).—Life on a big wheat ranch is the background of this melo-dramatic romance by the Miller 101 studio, which is interesting and gets over. The heroine is pretty and plays her part "according to Hoyle"—she will make a hit with susceptable spectators. Then we are shown the big steam reapers and threshing machines and they, too, give quality to the picture. A good offering.

THE BEAZLEYHOPPERS (Warner's).—A single reel from Miller's 101 ranch. It is a rather queer mixture and, though there is some good stuff in it due to the acting of the leading woman (a cook who is playing she's an actress at the Beazleyhopper ranch), there seems to us to be a number of sleepy places.

HELP, MURDER, POLICE (Warner's).—A "Starlight" offering in one reel with a speedy tumble farce. A fat man in it gets drowned. His friends pump him out with a big sewer pump and get up lobsters, fish, eels and the like. It will go.

DR. JEKYLL AND MR. HYDE DONE TO A FRAZZLE (Warner's).—A single reel burlesque not so much of the great play as of life and of other pictures. The sheer nonsense of it all is the reason of the fun. Very fair offering.

THE PROSPECTOR'S ROMANCE (Warner's).—A fair offering. The story is sentimental and not wholly convincing; but there is no stalling in the business, although it has no "thrills." The sub-titles in sloppy verse don't add anything to it. It is a story told by an old miner to a girl who has just quarreled with her lover and its object is to convince her that her action was not wise so that she will make up with him. The best thing in the offering is the acting of the love scenes—these are pleasing.

ROMANCE OF COYOTE HILL (Warner's).—A single reel by Miller 101 Ranch studio with a farcical story of cowboy pranks. The entertainment value of such offerings depends on the audience. We feel sure that many will find it very funny; but there are some who will not count it so.

Independent Specials

THE TERROR OF ANGER (Thanhouser), Nov. 10.—This story contains a dream in which the father, deserted by his wife, takes his son and brings him up in the wilderness. The return to primeval conditions is much better than the average effort along this line. The girl's experiences with the father and son are full of romantic interest, and have none of the vulgar touches so often found in these situations. The dream comes to a close during a struggle on the cliff between father and son. The father then determines to remain in civilization. This is well pictured and holds the interest firmly.

THE SILENT PERIL (Bison), Nov. 14.—A lively two-reel offering of a somewhat improbable sort, but well constructed and new in conception. Wm. Clifford appears as a young inventor in the U. S. Secret Service. The girl's father has invented a boat which can be operated from shore, something in the manner of a real invention we believe. Clifford, in love with the girl, wishes to do something to show his skill and blows up the boat by his secret invention, wrecking the vessel and at the same time kiling the operator, who is, of course, her father. The closing scene is tragic and the least satisfying in the story. The photography is good

THE FLOATING CALL (Reliance), Nov. 14.—A two-reel number, featuring Irene Hunt as a girl reporter, who traces some counterfeiters to their lair. The leading situations are all of an improbable sort, particularly hiding the queer money in the melons. At the same time the production is so novel and different that it proves decidedly entertaining. There is plenty of action and good suspense in the scenes where the girl falls into the clutches of the Italian counterfeiters. A message written on a piece of board thrown out of her window into the river brings aid and results in the capture of the gang. The scenes are well pictured throughout and for an improbable sort of yarn this proves very entertaining.

THE CHORUS GIRL'S THANKSGIVING (Rex), Nov. 15.—This two-reel offering, written by James Dayton, presents a story that is well acted and absorbing throughout. Herbert Rawlinson plays the young bank teller who steals money to have his mother operated upon. Anna Little plays the chorus girl, threatened with consumption. The two are brought together and the teller gives himself up so the girl gets the reward. She buys a ranch in California and on his release he goes to her. This has the proper atmosphere, good suspense and numerous other qualities which go to make up a finished production. A good offering.

THE TREASURE TRAIN (Imp), Nov. 16.—A well-photographed railroad story, with King Baggot and Arline Pretty in the cast. Mr. Baggott looks the part of the railroad foreman, who appeals to the officials of the road not to discharge the girl operator at Lone Pine. He tells of her brave deed in saving the treasure train with the picnic party on board. This is all brought out in the film. The story is not an exceptional one, but is well handled and works up considerable suspense in the second reel, where the girl makes a wild ride on a handcar to save the train.

THE OPENED SHUTTERS (Gold Seal), Nov. 17.—An excellent four-reel production of a novel by Clara Louise Burnham, opening with pictures of the author at home. Herbert Rawlinson, Anna Little and William Worthington play the leading parts, the latter appearing as Thinkright, a sort of Christian Science character, who brings the conflicting individuals together. Judge Trent and Aunt Martha, those typical, hard-shelled New England characters, are well represented. The photography and scenic effects are good throughout. Anna Little is particularly good as the rebellious Sylvia. This makes a very pleasing comedy-drama, and retains the spirit of Mrs. Burnham's story admirably.

SHORTY FALLS INTO A TITLE (Broncho), Nov. 18.—A two-reel number, featuring Shorty Hamilton. He is chief hostler for a Wild West show, but loses the job through the cook's practical joke on the boss. His double, Lord Chatham, is in trouble with the suffragettes and induces Shorty to take his place. He in turn exchanges places with Shorty. The resemblance of these two characters is striking. Quite a little amusement is gotten out of this exchange of personalities, though each is glad to switch back again later. The photography is good and as a whole this makes very fair comedy.

THE WONDROUS MELODY (Eclair), Nov. 18.—This is a conventional film story in which an old violinist's daughter marries against her father's wishes. Later the child is born and her husband deserts her. The strongest situation is in the second reel, where the child, which has developed musical genius, absorbs its grandfather's composition and wins a prize. This might have been handled more effectively if brought out in a more dramatic way. Mother and child and grandfather are happily united at the close.

HIS UNCLE'S WILL (Rex), Nov. 19.—Robert Leonard and Ella Hall appear in this two-reel comedy offering. The plot is unfortunately very familiar and the entire first reel is given up to establishing an old situation. The scenes in the second reel are more entertaining, being located at a girls' seminary, where the hero is employed as chauffeur The chief drawback of this number is lack of novelty in plot. The acting and photography are good.

THE MASTER OF THE HOUSE (Kay-Bee), Nov. 20.—A two-reel number in which Richard Stanton plays the part of a rich young Westerner. He is roped in by a New York girl's designing relatives. The scenes are finely photographed and well enacted. The Eastern life palls on him and he decides to return West with his wife. She refuses to come with him and he proceeds to tame her. He also whips her good-for-nothing brother. In the end the wife is glad to go with him. This is interesting and very well presented.

FOR THE PEOPLE (Victor), Nov. 20.—A two-reel political story with some unusual features in it. Matt Moore plays the part of a young man who grows up in a poor factory district. He runs for the state Legislature as sponsor for the Workingmen's Compensation Act, and is elected to office. Pictures of the State House at Columbus, O., are shown, also of Governor Cox, of Ohio, and other state officials. The pictures were taken during the actual passage of the act. A love story is also neatly woven into the production. Dorothy Phillips playing the girl. This is a political story with a fresh turn to it and is on the whole very entertaining.

EVERYMAN (Warner's).—This old morality play has been pictured in two reels and the title role is played by Constance Crawley. Miss Crawley is a wonder of grace in this role, but her fine qualities as a picture player are so well known that we need not further expatiate on them here. She and her company have made of it a very beautiful and dignified picture. The time will come when colleges will simply have to have all such films that are made.

THE BRACELET (Box Office Attraction).—A three-reeler made by the White Star studio. It tells a story of a libertine and his end, well-deserved if not according to law. The smooth-tongued brute had deceived the sister of a fisherman and left her to die and is now engaged to a society woman. The fisherman hears of it. He is soon stealing up with a pistol to where the villain is standing on the piazza —he had just had a quarrel with his fiancee. The villain becomes aware of the intruder and also draws a pistol. The guests inside the house hear a noise and find him dead with a pistol in his hand, and think that he has killed himself. Later, the fisherman meets the girl and they become friends—the bracelet he had given her is thrown into the sea. The picture has beautiful sea pictures and its action will hold interest fairly well.

A PICTURE PIONEER IN FRANCE.

George Davis, of the New York Exchange of Warner's Features, Inc., was a pioneer in making the moving picture popular in France. Fourteen years ago Mr. Davis and a partner got hold of a film entitled "La Passion" and traveled with it through the land of the fleur de lis. Wherever they stopped they hung up a sign bearing the legend, "American Electric Palace," whereupon the inhabitants would tumble over each other to see the show.

That was in the very early days of moving pictures. It didn't take much of a film to get the money, and Mr. Davis' picture commanded an admission fee of one to two francs

(20 to 40 cents). He says that nobody would even look at such a picture nowadays.

The entrance to one of his Electric Palaces is shown in the photograph, which is getting dim from age. He is the man in dark clothes seated behind the ticket booth.

Mr. Davis is now in Cuba in the interests of Warner's Features, Inc. The intention of the company is to establish an exchange in Havana.

"Rose of the Rancho" Coming

First of the Lasky-Belasco Features Said to Be a Marvel of Exactness.

IN the production of "The Rose of the Rancho," the first of the Belasco productions to be released by the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, and in which a complete Belasco cast is being used, the Lasky Company has gone to no end of extremes to make this production the most artistic that concern has yet turned out.

Two reels of the picture were retaken in order to introduce therein a Spanish saddle which was discovered shortly after the first part of the picture had been finished, and, in order to gain the atmospheric detail that this saddle would lend the picture, Mr. De Mille retook the first two thousand feet.

By making a monetary donation to the mission of San Fernando at Monterey, Mr. De Mille was allowed to use the mission grounds, and many of the scenes are laid in the historic old buildings throughout the vast acreage fronting the mission house.

An exact replica of the Castro Rancho was built on the new Lasky ranch, as was also a duplicate, in appearance, of the old Spanish custom house, both of which are to be destroyed in the final scenes of "The Rose of the Rancho."

Cecil B. De Mille and Wilfred Buckland made a trip to Guadalajara, Mexico, and there engaged forty native actors to appear in the roles of Vaqueros, Caballeros and Mexican Indians, and prevailed upon the Mexicans to bring their native costumes and characteristic mantillas and multi-colored gowns.

Padre Francisca de la Vianna, head of the Monterey mission, consented to appear in the picture, and actually performed the mock ceremony between Bessie Barriscale as the "Rose" and Monroe Salisbury as the "Gringo."

Richard Walton Tully, co-author of the play, assisted in the production, while Cecil B. De Mille and Wilfred Buckland handled the staging of the piece.

It will be released November 30 and shown at the Belasco Theater for the first time Sunday, Nov. 15, when a large party will be the guests of David Belasco, Jesse Lasky and Samuel Goldfish, the three men who are associated in the Lasky-Belasco productions.

SANTA MONICA JUVENILES GOOD ACTORS.

Director Richard Stanton of the Ince companies was surprised to learn during the production of "A Political Feud," a forthcoming Ince release, what a large amount of natural talent abounds in youngsters in and about Santa Monica, Cal., where the Inceville studios are located. In the early part of the action of the story, children play the important roles, and Mr. Stanton was obliged to recruit to the ranks of the players a number of boys and girls ranging in age from eight to fourteen years. He had no trouble in finding the juveniles. A multitude responded to the call. But he thought he would have trouble in getting the chosen ones to do as he commanded before the camera. He was mistaken. The youthful novices took to the task like ducks to water and succeeded in putting over the scenes with great success.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

"GORDON'S MOTION PICTURE COLLECTION."

UNDER the above title the Hamilton S. Gordon estate has issued a new collection of music for moving picture pianists. This music is compiled and composed by Sol. P. Levy, who composed the music for the feature film "Sealed Orders" and others. Mr. Levy has presented us with something a little different from the usual run of picture music. Aside from the fact that the music is of merit, both in composition and the selection, Mr. Levy has placed it before the pianist in a form both convenient and unique. There are two books, Part I. and Part II., which are sold for $1.00 for both (the two are not sold separately).

Mr. Levy has classified pictures in nineteen groups (or "types"). For each of these nineteen types he has provided musical themes of the kind most apt to be needed in each particular picture. For example, the first group is entitled:

"American Military—Revolutionary War" and contains eight themes—four on each page, to wit:

1. Minuet by Mozart. (Two strains.)
2. "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes." (Old song—for love scenes.)
3. Call to Arms (Bugle call—fife and drum "Yankee Doodle.")
4. "British Grenadiers."
5. Andante. (For camp-fire, etc.)
6. Battle Scene.
7. "Star-Spangled Banner."
8. Galop—for pursuits, etc.

The fourth group is entitled "American Indian," and consists of seven characteristic themes arranged as follows:

1. For camp or travel scene.
2. For love scene.
3. For war dance.
4. For sad scene, parting, etc.
5. Mysterious scene.
6. Combat, pursuit, struggle, etc.
7. Barcarolle, for water scene.

Two pages of music are devoted to each type of picture, of which, as before mentioned, there are nineteen, all contained in Part I. These pages open opposite one another—the idea being to do away with the necessity of turning the music during the picture.

Part II. consists largely of National Airs of different countries and descriptive music generally.

Many of the themes in these books are portions of longer numbers published by Hamilton S. Gordon. Of Mr. Levy's original compositions in this work, he is particularly happy in his battle and storm scenes—a species of descriptive music much in demand by picture pianists.

The publishers in their enthusiasm have made the time honored mistake of claiming that this collection "contains all the music necessary for any film." Don't let this prejudice you against it. Mr. Levy has really covered the ground about as thoroughly as can be done in 60 pages of music, and I believe his books are worth the price asked for them.

Study the Audience Also.

One who does not wish her name published says: "Like all motion picture houses, our audience is a mixed one, and in selecting my music for a six-reel program I aim to study the people as well as the pictures. As I am in a college town we have many college students as well as high school students, and for this class I select if possible one or two comic operas, such as 'High Jinks' or 'Sweethearts.' These I find always fit in well with the lighter dramas or educational pictures. Then for the lover of classical music I select such numbers as Wagner's 'Evening Star' or Schubert's 'Serenade,' which are so good for the heavier dramas. Perhaps there will be a drama of the heart interest type which features some old people, and then there may be an old man or woman in the house who will enjoy hearing 'Just a Song at Twilight' or 'When You and I Were Young, Maggie.' Then there is the large majority who only care for rags or popular songs, and this class I aim to please in the comedies. We cannot please every one, but I sincerely believe that by varying the program in this manner, when the performance ends there will at least be a few people to whom we have appealed and who will therefore come again to hear the style of music they like as well as to view the pictures.

"Signed, K. H. M."

The musician who has the opportunity to study his audience is fortunate; the one who takes advantage of that opportunity is wise. Musical accompaniments for pictures should not only be appropriate to the subject, but satisfying to the hearers. In the smaller towns and "neighborhood" theatres of the cities it may not be so difficult to get in touch with your patrons and learn their likes and dislikes musically, but in other places it must be largely guess work. Generally speaking, a mixed program—both musically and pictorially—will appeal to nearly everybody in turn. When one is sincere in the desire to properly accompany the pictures and nearly succeeds in satisfying one's self as well as pleasing the majority of the patrons, he (or she) has done about all that can be expected.

What to Play for Pictures.

About every so often somebody wants to know "what to play for pictures." If you were to ask a cook how to prepare food he would want to know whether you meant radishes or rabbits. There are almost as many kinds of pictures as there are edibles; and the taste of the consumers has something to do with it, too. Few pictures shown at present in the average five and ten-cent houses will permit of a masterly setting of high class music, though many of the dramas give opportunity for "sketching in" with gems of the best writers. "Heart interest" pictures and sympathetic stories often permit the thematic treatment, a simple form of which is to choose some well-known melody or some theme easily recognized and play it for leading character—at the first entrance and for every scene in which he (or she) predominates. A pathetic ballad for a sympathetic character. (Choruses of some of the contemporary ballads are particularly acceptable to the younger folk.) An "Oriental" or a mysterious for a Hindoo hypnotist. Some old time ballad if the character happens to be an old person—something in keeping with the character. When you find a picture which permits of a judicious use of a single theme frequently recurring throughout, this can be made very effective.

Melodramas and sensational pictures—and many of the multiple reels are nothing else—offer the best opportunities for working to details. This should not be abused, however; only the more prominent scenes and situations should be "played to." Happily, the day is passing when it was thought necessary to follow every change of action and every change of scene with a corresponding change in the music.

"What to play for the pictures" depends on the kind of pictures you have and the kind of audience you are trying to please.

If a house has been running long enough to establish a patronage, it is almost a certainty that you can judge the musical taste of the audience by the pictures shown. High class dramas attract a cultured audience capable of appreciating the best kind of music. Give them the best you can, but always try to choose something in keeping with the picture—and play it according to the action. If your music happens to be marked fortissimo and the scenes are quiet or pathetic, subdue your music. If that isn't sufficient, skip the movement. Playing a lot of classic stuff regardless of its fitness may please the music lovers, but it does not help the show as a whole. How you play is just as important as what you play.

In accompanying photoplays of the better class, don't chop your music up into short phrases in the effort to "play to the picture." Rather humor the number you are playing, and describe the action in that manner as much as possible. "Hurry music" is often very appropriate in the more tumultuous scenes, but don't drag in the ordinary melodramatic stuff too freely or you are apt to cheapen your work.

The sensational plays, on the other hand, attract the lovers of the old "10, 20 and 30" style of melodrama. Plenty of thrills, hair-breadth escapes, deep-dyed villainy and persecuted heroines. Melodramatic music was born and grew up in this atmosphere. Here you may play it unstintingly, but don't forget that these patrons also enjoy hearing some of the better class of music—particularly numbers which are well known.

Farces and slap-stick comedies appeal to the lovers of popular music and—entre nous—that includes all classes in varying degrees.

A "mixed program" implies a mixed audience, with a corresponding mixture of musical types. See K. H. M.'s letter, just quoted.

Says Managers Are Looking for Good Music.

Carl W. Baker, formerly of Van Wert, Ohio, now located in Minot, N. D. (Lyceum Theater), writes an interesting letter of which this is a part: "Myself and wife (violin and piano), took up picture playing six years ago and feel we owe much of our very good success to you and the Moving Picture World. We find this work very interesting. It is difficult for managers to find musicians who are capable of playing standard grades of music which they can feature and play to the pictures also; when they do find such they are willing to pay top salaries. Musicians who are willing can make this work profitable as well as interesting."

Mr. Baker has a five-piece orchestra well up in this line, but it took real work on his part to get them broken in. We would like to hear from more like him.

Also in the Dictionary.

C. W. K., of St. Paul, Minn., inquires:—"Is the word 'audience' correct as applied to the spectators in a moving picture theater? Your answer will decide a bet."

AUDIENCE: (1) The art of hearing or attending to sounds. (3) An assembly of hearers. (Webster.)

Strictly speaking, the word would not be correct as applied to an assembly of people viewing pictures. They are observers or spectators or viewers or onlookers or just lookers or something like that. But "audience" is a more convenient word; we are accustomed to it by association with the legitimate theater—we know just what it means when applied to the crowd in a picture theater—and custom is making its usage allowable at least.

If you are a musician, a singer, a candy-butcher or some other kind of a sound maker in a picture theater you may still refer to the bunch out in front as "the audience" and keep your conscience clear. And if I want to say "audience" I'll say it anyhow.

The winner of the bet please note my address—1942 W. 21st street, Chicago, Ill. I prefer to smoke the domestic brands.

OHIO WON'T PARTICIPATE IN EXPOSITION.

After considering the matter thoroughly it appears that the commercial organizations of most of the cities of Ohio have decided not to participate in the plan of showing at the Panama-Pacific Exposition industrial films covering their manufacturing and other activities. The Cleveland Chamber of Commerce has definitely notified the Ohio State Commission of the Exposition that it will not participate, and Cincinnati, Columbus and Toledo are understood to have decided on similar action. In the case of Cincinnati, at least, the ground of the decision is not any lack of appreciation of the advertising value of motion pictures used in this way, but a belief that the benefit to the city, or to any other city, would be small, on account of the comparatively insignificant impression which one city would make among so many.

VITAGRAPH ENTERTAINS.

Wednesday evening, November 4, was a special press night at the Vitagraph Theater, and a number of New York newspaper men attended the exhibition as the guests of "Pop" Rock, A. E. Smith and J. Stuart Blackton. After witnessing the very excellent program of real vitagraph features the party gathered about a long table in the restaurant of the Hotel Astor where a light collation was served. Present were Wallace Ham and E. E. Hart, Evening Sun; H. H. Niemeyer, Times; Victor Watson and Wesley Hamer, American; Frank T. Pope, Journal of Commerce; Mr. Mullen, Herald; Graham Baker, Brooklyn Times; Mr. Donohue, Chicago American; John W. Semler and Mr. Winchester Morning Telegraph; W. A. Johnston, Motion Picture News, and James L. Hoff, Moving Picture World. Sam Spedon assisted Messrs. Rock, Smith and Blackton in entertaining the party. Two very pleasant hours were spent in the exchange of ideas "touchin' on and appertainin' to" pictures.

Clara Horton

ONE of the sweetest little girls who has delighted the hearts of picture audiences in Eclair productions for some time past is leaving for Tucson, Arizona, in the person of Clara Horton. Little Miss Horton was found sitting demurely on the edge of a large trunk while her mother, the wardrobe woman for the Eclair Company, deftly packed some of Clara's finery. I discovered that she was born eleven years ago in Halsey street, Brooklyn. While attending public school she was given opportunity to appear in a tableau production during Christmas holidays. Her specialty, which consisted of a simple toe dance, was "put over" with all the grace and skill of a grown-up. A theatrical manager present saw likely material in the little girl, and with her mother's permission took her under his wing. She was sent to dancing school, and after a finished course secured an engagement in a pantomime production of "Jack and the Beanstalk." In company with her mother she traveled with this production from coast to coast. To little Clara was granted the unusual experience of a European trip, and she played in the principal capitals on the Continent. From overwork her health became such that her mother brought her back to America, and after a rest of one year she secured a part in a pantomime production of "Cinderella." Mrs. Horton deemed it best that Clara be kept from the vicissitudes and temptations of the road. With this in mind she cast about for a permanent position with a motion picture company, and before long Clara had been engaged by Eclair, whose stock company was then located at Fort Lee, New Jersey. The indefinable charm and beautiful simplicity of the little stage child immediately won the hearts of directors and players, and under careful direction and coaching she became one of the cleverest child artists appearing in the pictures.

Clara Horton.

Blessed with a wonderful head of long golden curls, great blue eyes fringed by dark lashes, and a complexion the color of peaches, Clara forms a beautiful picture indeed on the screen. She has been with the Eclair Film Company, Inc., for the past two years, and during that time has played in over two hundred and fifty productions.

Recently the entire producing forces of the Eclair Film Company, Inc., moved to their newly built studios and laboratories at Tucson, Arizona, and Clara will soon be in the land of cactus and sage-brush, accompanied by her mother. At Tucson she will head a newly formed company of juvenile artists and will appear in both Western and society productions.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

OF the motion picture actors who left this country in response to the call to arms of their native lands, Marcel Morhange, a Frenchman who worked at the Vitagraph studios in Brooklyn, was among the first to respond, and is one of the first to get direct information to his family and friends in this country regarding his movements. No doubt other actors who went to the war are rendering just as valiant service to their respective countries, and it is not on account of failure in that direction that they have not been heard from. The Frenchman had the foresight when he first reached Paris to make the bureau of the Brooklyn Eagle in that city his headquarters and whenever that bureau sends news of the war to its Brooklyn office it incorporates anything it may receive concerning Morhange and the Brooklyn office communicates it direct to his wife and child in Brooklyn through one of its reporters.

Morhange and his wife and child came to this country from France with Mme. Sarah Bernhardt about two years ago. They worked as "extras" at the Vitagraph studios about a year before the father went to the war. The wife and the child, who is about five years old, are still working "extra," playing prominent parts with Miss Helen Gardner under Director Gaskill. The child is very pretty and clever. When Morhange received notification to report to the French Consul in New York City and did so many of his fellow "extras" criticized him. They told him his place was with his wife and child, especially as their means were limited. It was then that Morhange gave answer to similar sentiments on the part of many people who cannot understand why foreigners who come to this country with the intention of making it their home should leave it to take up arms on the other side of the Atlantic. Morhange said he was not leaving his wife and child through heroic impulses alone, but with the intention of preserving something for them for the future. "If I stay here with them I can only make a living while I am able to work," he said, "My wife, child and myself will in time inherit property and money from relatives in France and if I do not respond to the call it will mean a forfeiture of those inheritances and imprisonment for me at any time after the war I might visit France. I may not return from the war, but that I have done nothing to deprive my wife and child of what is coming to them will be some consolation."

Many people are disinclined to believe stories of warm friendship being manifested between French and German reservists before their departure for the other side. The prevailing opinion is that a spirit of hatred must have arisen as soon as it became known that the people of those two countries were to jump at each other's throats again and re-enact the scenes of 1870. Nevertheless, in one case at least, two reservists parted on this side the best of friends, Morhange and a German "extra" were both working in a motion picture under Director Gaskill when the call to arms was issued. They selected a day when the Vitagraph studios were idle to report to their respective Consuls. They travelled together to this city. While the Frenchman was in his consul's office the German was awaiting his return downstairs, and the Frenchman waited while the German arranged his affairs. After "signing up," as they termed it, they adjourned to a cafe and celebrated. Although the men had known each other a comparatively short time, the friendship manifested by them for each other was very strong. It is said that motion picture work makes the participants a family and creates among them a spirit of esteem and intimacy that is not as noticeable in many other vocations. However, the spirit of friendship manifested by these two motion picture actors was undoubtedly sincere. It was predicted when they left the studio arm in arm to report for the war that they would return separately and very much the worse for wear. Director Gaskill remarked as they departed. "Those are two nice boys, but I am afraid that before night they will have their first battle."

Contrary to this expectation, the two warriors returned as they left. The German was to sail first. He entertained Morhange and his family at dinner the day after the "signing up." The night before he was to sail the Morhange family gave a dinner to the German. During a talk after dinner the German asked Jacqueline, Morhange's little girl, "'Jac,' where is your papa going?" "To Europe," she replied. "What for?" With some display of spirit the child promptly answered, "To help kill all the Germans!" Instantly the German raised the child in a firm embrace and kissed her repeatedly. There was not a tearless eye in the room. As he released the child the German said, "Well, 'Jac' dear, I hope your papa and I will never meet in battle and that we will all be together again with Mr. Gaskill and the Vitagraph."

Nothing has been heard from the German. The last heard of Morhange was through the Brooklyn Eagle by cable from Paris, under date of October 27. He succeeded in getting back to Paris after narrowly escaping the Germans in a hot pursuit from the front. His movements are now kept secret and it is forbidden to state where he was in danger of capture. He was attached as dispatch bearer and interpreter to the Yorkshire regiment of the English army and later was made British staff interpreter. "I knew he would—what you call—'make good'," said Mrs. Morhange the other day, "and his German friend is all to the—the—what you put on sandwiches—yes, mustard. But I wish they were both here again."

Come to think of it, wouldn't these incidents in the lives of these German and French reservists make a ripping good war scenario? No hatred, no horrors; yet reflecting actual occurrences.

According to the New York World confession has at last been made by temperance and church workers, as well as the liquor interests, that motion pictures are a powerful ally in temperance work. The Brooklyn Excise Bureau announces that fifty-nine saloons have gone out of business in that borough since last January and there has been a falling off of $75,000 in license fees. In the boroughs of Manhattan and Bronx one hundred and six saloons have gone out of business within the past year and, according to a statement by the excise department, the loss of license fees in Greater New York for the past year has been close to $200,000. It is not claimed that the motion picture houses have been responsible for all the failures, but there are facts in hand to show that they were the direct cause for many of them. Names and addresses are given of saloonkeepers who "blame the motion picture for rotten business." One saloonkeeper is credited with the statement that there is bound to be a reaction, but the motion pictures will put a lot of saloons out of business before people get tired of them. Corner loafers and saloon hangers-on, he says, are fast disappearing.

This situation is identical with the claims the motion picture people have always made. It is the best public refutation thus far given to the charge of the narrow-minded and prejudiced that motion picture houses are "dens of vice and immorality." But the confessions do not extend to the actual sphere of good work done by motion pictures. The time will come when the conscience of the confessors will compel them to admit that the pictures are among the greatest factors of the present time in the advancement of all branches of moral and intellectual work. Impartial investigation will establish this. Every person in the country who is sincere in advocating reform is a motion picture fan and their example will eventually bring into the fold those that have been wasting time and money for years in trying to hamper and break down the makers and exhibitors of motion pictures by ridiculous regulations and laws born of selfish purposes, or inability to understand and grasp conditions as they are really presented.

SELIG ONE-REEL ANIMAL PICTURES.

The demand for Selig one-reel animal pictures immediately following the announcement of a series to be released, has demonstrated beyond a doubt that this class of photoplays is desired by exhibitors. Mr. Selig has been working on this series for some time and a number of exceptionally interesting scenarios have been especially prepared. A large number of these have been produced and dates for their release will be announced later. Exhibitors have written in to say that they want all of the Selig one-reel animal pictures obtainable.

In most of the Selig one-reel animal pictures, Kathlyn Williams will be featured, which naturally will furnish an added attraction and render them additionally profitable to exhibitors. All these releases will be made through General Film Co., and will constitute part of the Selig program.

"Through the Valley of Shadows"

Florence Turner Is Featured in an Unusually Appealing Story in Four Parts, Released Through Hepworth.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

HERE is a story abounding in pathos. It is a domestic tragedy that narrowly escapes being a blood tragedy. The basic theme is as old as time itself—the separation of a couple through the man's absorption in professional duties. Its working out is different; as we see it on the screen it moves to an unusual degree, even when that screen is situated in a little room several hundred feet above the roar of Broadway, where there is no orchestra or any of the theatrical accompaniments which some deem so essential to the proper showing of a picture.

"Through the Valley of Shadows" is written by Larry Trimble, its producer, and Miss Florence Turner. It is a real screen story. Its principal characters are three—no, four; by no means must we overlook Jean, the collie, whose entrances, actions and crestfallen exits contribute in no immaterial measure to the strength of the play. Miss Turner portrays the wife who momentarily succumbs to the flattery of a man of the world who is worse than unscrupulous—in his defeat he is vindictive, poisoning the ear of the husband with unspeakable falsehoods. By his influence in theatrical circles, which the wife frequents in the hope of obtaining employment, he is able for too long a time to prevent her from making a living in the line for which she is fitted. That later on, when the wife has obtained a place as a motion picture actress, she should take advantage of her opportunity and use on this man, playing opposite her, the knife put into her hand seems the natural thing for a woman driven to desperation. It may be a convenient coincidence that her doctor husband should be called to attend the injured actor and discover the wife long lost to him, but it all goes to create situations of power—and the most powerful are those of her illness and convalescence in the old home to which the husband restores her and the ultimate honor of which she has always protected.

Mr. Clifford is Dr. Cross, the husband who, in a rage, turns out his wife and who immediately afterward repents and institutes a fruitless search for her. Mr. Clifford gives a fine interpretation, displaying strength and feeling. Edward Lingard is Oscar Mailling, the actor who informs Dr. Cross, that Mrs. Cross has tired of him, when, as a matter of fact, she had rejected him in the beginning. For his careful and faithful portrayal of the part that falls to him Mr. Lingard will be very properly disliked. And there is Jean, of whom—not which—we have spoken, and of whom much more might be said.

If Miss Turner is one of your favorites, don't miss this picture. If you are unacquainted with her work, don't miss this opportunity to see her.

Steffanson Rescue Pictures

Sunset Motion Picture Co. Will Release Interesting Subject in December.

M. E. Cory, general manager of the Sunset Motion Picture Co., has just returned to San Francisco from Seattle where he went to meet the Arctic Expedition which returned on the now world-famous rescue ship "King and Wing." Cory is very enthusiastic over the negative secured and claims to have the greatest picture ever made of the frozen north. A picture showing the capture of live young walrus in which a native is shown on either side of the walrus with their teeth sunk in its flippers holding it thus while they fasten the ropes with their hands, is only one of the many sensational animals pictures.

The big feature of the picture is, of course, the rescue from Wrangel Island of the survivors of the wrecked Karluk, the Steffanson expedition ship. The rescue was accomplished in the face of the greatest danger. The U. S. S. Bear made several unsuccessful attempts to affect the rescue during the summer. The Russian and Canadian governments also tried to reach the island, as well as several privately owned ships. Even the King and Wing was unsuccessful upon the first attempt. The King and Wing was finally successful in getting to within a few miles of the island and taking off the unfortunates who had spent over a year there.

Scenes were made of their huts in which they had lived, of the graves of those who had died, and breaking camp and going aboard the King and Wing. On deck close up pictures were made of the entire group after which they were fitted out with fresh clothing and their old clothes thrown overboard. About half way to Nome, the King and Wing met the U. S. S. Bear making another attempt to effect the rescue. Capt. Bartlett, former skipper of the Karluk, was aboard the Bear. Pictures were made showing Bartlett coming aboard the King and Wing and greeting his old crew. The survivors were then transferred aboard the Bear for the rest of the trip to Nome.

Cory states positively that no other camera man could possibly have secured genuine pictures of the Steffanson Rescue and it is said that another vessel having a camera man abroad succeeded in reaching Wrangle Island and posed the boats crew around the deserted huts to make a fake picture.

It is the intention of the Sunset Company to give a private exhibition of the picture as soon as it is finished, after which it will be taken to New York.

December 1st has been set for release date.

MUTUAL'S WINNIPEG OFFICE EXPANDS.

Owing to increase in business the Mutual Film Corporation of Canada, Ltd., located at 40-48 Aikins Block, McDermott avenue, Winnipeg, Manitoba, has been compelled to seek bigger quarters and has secured favorable and spacious offices at 26 and 27 Aikins block, a few doors away from its old home. J. H. Boothe, manager of this Mutual branch, has been in charge of this exchange for the past four years, having become connected with it when it was known as the Gaumont Company of Canada, Ltd. "Considering conditions due to the war, money stringency, etc.," says Mr. Boothe, "the Manitoba exhibitors as a whole have done very well. In some localities business has not been quite up to the past years, but it has been better than at first expected. The Mutual has been quite successful. The bookings for its serial picture, 'The Million Dollar Mystery,' has been phenomenal and from the number of inquiries that are coming into this office regarding the new serial 'Zudora,' it appears that the bookings for this big production will be heavier." Mr. Boothe announces that J. M. Cummings, general manager of Canadian Mutual office, has recently been in Winnipeg and reports that conditions in the eastern part of Canada are very satisfactory.

"Ready Money"

Five-Part Lasky Drama, with Edward Abeles in the Leading Role, Is a Good Production.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

IN "READY MONEY," the Lasky five-part subject released on November 5, we may not have an altogether wholesome moral, judged from stricter standards, but we certainly have good entertainment. The theme may be said to be rather unmoral than immoral, insofar that the hero of the drama succeeds in business partly through the artful assistance of a slick countefeiter who has a most comprehensive understanding of human nature—the impulse to give to him who hath or whoever it is believed possesses. In spite of the fact that the man escapes arrest we are led to believe that he ceases his illegal operations—he destroys notes which he insists are the best he ever made—so why complain?

There are in the large cast excellent character drawings. Edward Abeles has the leading role, that of Steve Baird, a young man who goes west to make his fortune and takes an option on a mine. Theodore Roberts as Mike Reardon, the big western friend and partner of Steve, makes one of the hits of the piece. When he "cleans up" in rapid fashion the three assailants who attempt to put him out of business there is nothing forced or artificial about the proceeding. All of his work is of the best. James Neil as Jackson Ives, the counterfeiter, gives a strong performance, as also does Dick La Reno in the role of Captain West of the Secret Service. Bessie Barriscale is charming in the part of Grace Tyler, the sweetheart of Steve.

There is a sprinkling of comedy running throughout the five reels. Mr. Abeles makes the most of these situations and also is commendable in the dramatic scenes. The story is an intermixture of mining stock promoting and counterfeiting in New York, of plotting in Arizona to obtain possession of the property on which first Steve had an option and of which he was later the owner, subject to a mortgage held by Morgan. There are many moments of suspense, and these are carefully handled so as to bring out their full value. The staging is artistically done, the scenes of the New Year's Eve banquet and the street crowds of merrymakers being especially notable. So, too, the producer has been successful in establishing his mining town atmosphere, both as to backgrounds and types. "Ready Money" is a strong combination of western and society drama and should be popular.

WARNER TO RELEASE HUMANOLOGY PRODUCT.

Warner's Features announces that it will release the product of the Humanology Film Producing Company of Boston. This company was formed recently by Jack Rose, who is president, and with whom is associated a number of prominent Boston business men. W. W. Clarke, a former member of the Massachusetts legislature and a lawyer, is first vice-president and treasurer, D. W. Robertson, second vice-president. and E. V. Finch is secretary. The company is capitalized at $250,000 and has a studio at Medford, Mass.

Allied with Mr. Rose in the production of pictures is Ella Wheeler Wilcox, famous the world over as a writer of poetry. By this arrangement all of Mrs. Wilcox's poems will be available for motion picture purposes.

Marguerite Courtot

SEVENTEEN years ago, or, to be exact, on August 20, 1897, the population of Summit, N. J., was increased by the arrival of a daughter in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Courtot. According to the record in the Summit Bureau of Vital Statistics, the name of the newcomer was Marguerite Gabrielle Courtot—quite a hefty name for so tiny and dainty a specimen of humanity.

Marguerite Courtot.

As is generally known, Miss Courtot is enrolled under the Kalem banner. In fact, she has never appeared in any motion pictures save those bearing the famous "Bursting Sun" trade mark. That Kalem recognizes her protean ability can be seen by the fact that this seventeen-year-old girl is now portraying leading roles opposite Tom Moore.

Here is how it came about. About two years ago, Kalem established a studio at Cliffside, N. J. Miss Courtot resided just a short distance away and frequently had occasion to pass the place. It happened that the producing director in charge of the studio was in great need of a girl of Miss Courtot's type. To his great delight, the director found that one of his players was intimately acquainted with the Courtot family. That night, in company with this player, the director called upon the Courtots and offered Marguerite a position. The following morning found the girl working in her first motion picture.

Barely two years have passed since Miss Courtot's initial appearance before the motion picture public, nevertheless the roles this girl has portrayed in that time reveal most strikingly her wonderful talent. Such roles as Valentine de Mornay, in Kalem's production of "A Celebrated Case"; Zoe, in "The Octoroon"; Kathlyn, in "The Green Rose"; Melissa, the unfortunate sister, in "Fate's Midnight Hour"; Annette, in "The Girl and the Stowaway," and Millicent, in "The Girl and the Explorer," would ordinarily be deemed formidable by the most experienced actresses. Miss Courtot, however, handled these roles in a manner which led even captious critics to pronounce her a finished artiste.

PROGRAM FOR DETROIT EXHIBITORS.

Forty-seven Theaters Using Universal Service Will be Supplied with Sixty-four Page Booklet.

AN enterprise that has prospects of growing greatly is to be given a trial in Detroit. It will be in the nature of a weekly program to be used by 47 theaters showing Universal films. A company has been organized under the style of the Universal Photoplay Weekly, with offices at 1120 Chamber of Commerce. G. B. Hiller, who originated the idea, is general manager. The company is incorporated for $250,000, of which Mr. Hiller will be the largest stockholder. The remainder of the stock is to be sold to Detroit people. The regular Universal Weekly, which is issued by the Universal Company, is to be boiled down and made the program for houses using Universal films. The book or program will contain 64 pages, half reading matter and half local advertising. The programs will be practically the same, except that each theater will have its name on the frontispiece and its own program. It will also have a half page in which it can "talk" to patrons.

Each theater will receive approximately 3,000 copies a week. This means that the total number to be printed each week will be 100,000. Each theater will either mail or distribute the programs weekly so that they will be in the hands of their patrons not later than Monday. There is no charge to the theaters for the programs. Most of the houses will mail them each week, a few deciding to have them distributed by carrier. The company getting out the program makes its money through the advertising. A force of ten solicitors have been active for the past thirty days and have secured contracts from the largest advertisers in the city.

"The Country Mouse"

Four-Reel Bosworth Picture Showing How Rural Legislator's Wife Wins Her Battle in the State Capital.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

ONE of the most interesting situations for dramatic development that a great civilized republic offers is the position of a rural legislator's wife elected with her husband to leave the farm and live in some state capital. If her husband is a mere commonplace man elected in some off year, her experiences are not extraordinary; but in cases where the man is an individual of inherent power she runs the risk of watching him grow out of her sphere and of seeing the romance of their married life destroyed. Self-reproaches and tears are of the worst possible use to her; she has to break loose from old things that were once good enough and make a new person of herself, if she wants to keep up with him. Of course, the husband may, for instance, choose to remain simple and curb his ambitions, and there are other innumerable ways of treating the situation, almost any one of which offers chances of probing down into human feelings as deep as one pleases.

Adele Farrington.

In this picture, "The Country Mouse," the legislator's wife finds her husband taking very naturally to capital society. He is a man of power and is more and more sought after, while she, awkward and ill-at-ease in company, finds herself despised as a frump without the spirit to make herself acceptable to her husband's friends. She gets desperate, fearing that she is going to lose her husband altogether, and calls to her aid a fashionable modiste who helps her to get the right clothes and to make herself fashionable. The character in this situation presents difficulties to the actress, who is required to make a very striking change, seem probable to the spectator. This particular experience is not wholly new in pictures. But it is sure that the heart-interest of the story as it is played by Hobart Bosworth, as the legislator, and by Adele Farrington, as his wife, holds strongly.

Scene from "The Country Mouse" (Bosworth).

We must mention also some interesting scenes in the picture of rural politics that are delightful, especially the nominating of the "people's champion" by acclamation after he has made a ringing speech against the "octopus" railroad. Such scenes are a strong asset in a picture. The city scenes were taken in Sacramento and have just the kind of atmosphere that the offering needed. The photography is clear and the transitions from scene to scene are smooth and natural.

Famous Players Engage Marie Doro

THE Famous Players Film Company has secured the exclusive motion picture services of the celebrated young star Marie Doro, who has one of the largest metropolitan followings of any of the younger players on the American stage. Miss Doro has recently won added lustre by the distinction of being selected as co-star with William Gillette and Blanche Bates in the present season's important revival of "Diplomacy," one of the more notable of the current Charles Frohman productions.

The Famous Players will present Miss Doro in her greatest dramatic success, "The Morals of Marcus," by William J. Locke. This production attained such popularity at the time of its stage appearance that it is hardly necessary to recall the role created by Marie Doro—that of the little girl from a Syrian harem, who upsets the household of the precise Sir Marcus, and plays havoc with his dignity and his heart, after losing her own to him. The absorbing delineation of the girl who finds her soul and who changes from a playful young animal to a woman capable of suffering and sacrificing for the man she loves is one of the greatest character developments ever conceived.

Marie Doro.

The film production of "The Morals of Marcus," like that of "Zaza," will be released by the Famous Players-Charles Frohman Company.

LEWIS COMPLETES PRODUCTION OF "THE THIEF"

Edgar Lewis, as director for the Box Office Attraction Co., has completed his screen production of "The Thief," which is in five parts. The picture is said to be one of the best reproduced from a famous play. Mr. Lewis is now preparing to present a film version of "Samson," another well-known drama by Henri Bernstein, author of "The Thief." Mr. Lewis is a believer in stunts of magnitude and the Box Office Attraction Co. is giving him a free rein in every particular. After "Samson," another film sensation is promised by the well-known director.

trend toward realism. The story, like many of those following lines indicated in "The Prisoner of Zenda," has the same perilous adventures of a hero transported from the commonplace of ordinary existence into the formalities of ceremonials of a small kingdom tucked away somewhere between the Causasian and Balkan mountains known in this case as "Valaria." There is a King of Valaria, a lovely Princess and a delightfully villainous Archduke aspiring for the throne and her hand when an American of "royal descent," Major Armand Dalberg, appears on the scene.

How delightful! How lovely the women are! How handsome the uniforms of Archduke Lotzen and King Frederick of Valaria! It is all like a dream, or like grand opera on the screen. The royal descent of Major Dalberg is discovered by King Frederick, and the young American is made an Archduke while you wait as well as Colonel of the Red Hussars. How fine he looks in his new uniform. The Archduke of Lotzen secretly boils with rage—one can tell from his wicked glances, but he is as polished as a rapier on the surface. He bides his time until that generous help to authorship, mere chance, brings him into contact with the most charming adventuress ever pictured on the screen, Mrs. Marion Spencer in the story, Sally Crute at her best, in reality.

In spite of the fact that Marc MacDermott makes a most delightful villain, even his star wanes when Sally simply dominates every situation in which she appears, until it becomes her play. Her smile makes that of Mona Lisa look like a sickly smirk. Sally's smile is not repressed—it is given free and natural expression—but it loses none of its Sphinx-like mystery on that account. It has as many shades of meaning as there are tints in an evening sky and all quite as pleasing to look upon. It is Sally's mission to break up the love affair between the young American and the Valarian Princess at the instigation of Archduke Lotzen.

Can you not guess that the plot fails, that the hero and heroine are united in spite of all? Sally does a lot of damage to the lovers, meanwhile, and small wonder. The great wonder is that the whole court does not succumb to her charms and fall in love as one man. Those in the audience certainly will. Only force of habit enabled the critics to sit still when watching Sally on the screen. Critics are not supposed to have any feelings, but such as they are, Sally gathered them all into her net. Richard Ridgely did all he could with the combined beauties of art and nature to enslave attention to his play, but what is the use of trying to rival a lovely woman in her sweetest moods? It can't be done. A vous Mademoiselle Belle Sourire.

Frances Gibson.

THE subject of this sketch comes from a wonderful theatrical family which, including father and mother, number thirteen, all of whom are in the profession in one branch or the other; in fact, as the old saying goes, she was "born to the business," in Everton, England. Her first appearance was in Wilson Barrett's Company, at the age of three years. She played child's parts for six years, then, coming to the United States with her parents, was placed in Holy Cross convent, 42d street, New York City, where, after five years' attendance, she again entered the profession and played the role of "Little Bo-Peep" in "Babes in Toyland."

Frances Gibson.

In stock, Miss Gibson has essayed some of the most difficult emotional roles. She was unfortunate enough to have been in San Francisco at the time of the earthquake and lost all her wardrobe and valuables in that disaster. For several seasons she appeared in a single singing and dancing act, on the Orpheum circuit. During the last few seasons she has appeared as a member of stock, in principal parts, with the Lubin, Thanhauser and Solax companies. Miss Gibson is an expert equestrienne, rope and pole climber, swimmer, etc., which accomplishments are of great value to her in picture work. She has appeared in over fifty film productions, prominent among which are "Nicholas Nickleby," "Lady Betty's Strategy," "The Mills of the Gods," "The Rose of the Circus," etc. She is at present working in special features, having just finished as lead in the four-part railroad feature, "Steve Hill's Awakening."

Farmers Great Picture Lovers.

State Fair Uses Motion Pictures as Comparison in Advertising to Rural Communities.

THE farmer is interested in the moving pictures. Institutions and persons seeking the attention of the farmer realize this. Two big state fairs this year made direct appeals to this new pursuit of the rural resident. "It beats the movies" was the slogan of the Wisconsin State Fair held at Milwaukee. Advertisements of the Michigan State Fair at Detroit were illustrated with strips of film picturing the different attractions.

"Great possibilities are believed to exist in the use of the moving picture in instructing the farmer. * * * The work is in its incipiency," wrote Charles A. Whittle, of the Georgia State College of Agriculture to the editor of a farm paper. "It has served to illustrate the facts which the agricultural leaders wanted to impress in a way which could not have been equaled had all the animals, machinery, etc., been conveyed to the meeting place of the farmers by a solid train. An institute worker says that the farmers would not have taken as much interest in the real as in the movies. There is the further advantage of flashing out in concise sentences, between pictures, the facts which are revealed in the pictures—a task almost impossible for a speaker to accomplish so well in an address."

Nearly all state agricultural colleges have projection apparatus and possess valuable films relating to farm work in that state. One in the southwest has its own camera men to record interesting experiments, to show results and to exploit student life.

"Rip Van Winkle"

Thomas Jefferson Plays Rip in a Picture Made from Play Version of His Father—Alco Five-Reel Offering.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE famous Jefferson family—great grandfather, father and son—have been playing Rip for almost a hundred years now; but in a very real sense Thomas Jefferson is the most fortunate of them all—his portrayal will still be giving pleasure a hundred years from now. The picture was made from the working stage script of Joseph Jefferson, and Edwin Middleton is responsible for its translation into picture form. He has profited by the mistakes of his predecessors—the picture (there are five reels of it) is undeniably the best of this great story we have seen. In one or two places there are still possibilities of improvement; but in that part dealing with the little men up on the mountain with whom Rip had dealings about the carrying and sampling of a keg, it seems perfect and this was the hardest part of all to handle. The places where it seems awkward are in the village part of the story and come partly from loyalty to the stage version. These great classics are dangerous to handle; for it takes too much courage to change them enough to make the best pictures.

Thomas Jefferson as "Rip."

Thomas Jefferson accents the heart-feeling in the character of Rip; makes him appeal to the spectator's heart so strongly that the dramatic tension is felt even through those stagey scenes at the close. Indeed, it is strange that we believe the tale at all; but as Mr. Jefferson plays its central character the emotions of his fate are so compellingly deep and true that it really lives. There is more truth than fairy tale in it, view it how you will—in a way we all become Rips. A well-selected cast supports the leading man and among them Clairet Claire, in the role of Rip's wife, is especially worthy of notice, and the innkeeper of H. B. Blackmore is another most pleasing characterization. The scenes and the backgrounds do very well and have been clearly photographed. The picture would go, even if it were merely a new offering; but it is doubly sure to find favor, it being a great play with Thomas Jefferson as Rip.

A One-Reel "Beauty" Allegory of Fine Theme and Exquisite Treatment.

WITH a vital theme to raise it far above the average of weary mediocrity and a treatment both delicate and beautiful, "Motherhood" takes very high rank as a one-reel production. To a critic who is accustomed to view two or three triangles a week, with a few chases, burglars, mistaken identities and whisker comedies thrown in by way of incompetent variety, the living subject and capable handling of "Motherhood" came almost as a revelation. It shows that we are getting closer to the human heart, that warm and sympathetic human heart, which enables us to grasp the fact that none of us are without flaw and arouses a tenderness of sentiment on that very account.

Scene from "Motherhood" (Beauty).

It may be that our strongest plays will relate to the individual caught in the web of his own complex nature, powerless at times to extricate himself, for in that situation lie some of the most dramatic, if not tragic, facts of contemporary life. Our greatest philosophers are in accord with our greatest dramatists on at least one subject—that progress is only possible through the discovery of mistaken conceptions concerning ourselves and our social relations with one another.

The object of marriage is now what it has always been, in a finer sense than ever, but there exists a great deal that is false, misleading and even hypocritical in the ideals sometimes presented to a young girl's mind. She enters it as the girl in "Motherhood" does the garden, where Cupid sits at the gate, to cull its sweetest flowers, and a more-or-less childish innocence as to its full meaning. She expects to dwell in an unreal atmosphere, a sort of make-believe wife, amused and petted as she has been by doting parents and friends. Men often love such women—the innocence of their natures is so close to that of the babes they are destined to give the world, that it may be a garden of the darlingest flowers—but when the full significance of marriage comes to such tender hearts long after the ceremony, they may break or give way to destructive frivolity.

The allegory shows such a young wife on the brink of a happiness-wrecking decision, brought to a realization of right and wrong through a series of prophetic visions, with a happy result. The treatment of this delicate subject is not only consistently delicate, but it is given an exquisite charm by a dainty method of telling. The new art is destined to be one of the greatest instruments in the world for teaching us to see ourselves as we are, to know ourselves, to define our actual and spiritual relations with one another, when we get to an average as high as "Motherhood."

A Detective Story Beginning in India and Ending in America—Made by American Pathe Company.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THIS, we believe, is the first picture made by the Pathe Company in its American studios for some months. It is a four-reel story of mystery. Among its opening scenes, which are laid in India, there is a set so astonishingly like a Brahman temple that one will wonder whether it were really taken in the Occident—it is an excellent specimen of studio craftmanship. We may state at once that the picture is filled with extraordinarily beautiful sets and backgrounds and they all have been perfectly photographed. Pretty costumes perfectly become the luxuriously appointed interiors and help in making many a scene as charming as can be.

The story increases in interest and suspense as it unfolds—the last two reels of it reach the point of being gripping. The first half follows beaten lines; but in its continually changing incident, will be pretty sure to please well enough to hold safely till the real mystery begins to be felt by the spectator. The "sacred gem" is, in the first scenes, the chief ornament of an Indian idol. An American, disguised as an Oriental, steals it while all, except a fakir, are asleep; but the latter sets up such a commotion that the whole city joins in the thief chase. Yet he gets away and reaches America, to be murdered in his berth on a fast express train. The Indian priests had followed and one accomplishes his death in a most unusual way. The gem goes by his will to his niece, an heiress with a wonderful house and beautiful grounds. How her fiance is accused of stealing the gem from her and how he proves himself innocent, much to the astonishment of the spectators, makes a really good yarn, one that will be welcome to even critical patrons.

The cast includes Charles Arling, Edna Mayo, William Rosell and Ernest Truax. These players are well known—it is the first appearance of Edna Mayo, we are told, in pictures. They do excellent work.

MAY IRWIN IN HER GREATEST COMEDY TRIUMPH.

America's foremost comedienne, May Irwin, in the title role of the film version of the most celebrated of all her stage triumphs, "Mrs. Black Is Back," by George V. Hobart, is the next Famous Players subject to appear on the Paramount program, scheduled for release November 30. May Irwin is inimitable as the irrepressible Mrs. Black, who deceives her husband about her age, and who goes through a period of comic anguish as the result.

Miss Irwin appeared in the original stage production of "Mrs. Black" for many seasons, and in the five-part Famous Players feature this distinguished star even surpasses the merits of her stage performance. Little need be said of either the play or the star, for both have gained individual distinction, and there is no doubt that the film version will add considerably to the popularity of both. May Irwin's wonderful powers of mimicry, her keen sense of comedy, and her facile eye-brows, or an inimitable "May Irwin gesture" to convey an entire situation, render her an invaluable addition to the realm of photo-comedy.

A STIRRING melodrama, performed by Japanese, "The Vigil," contains much that is new on the eternal theme of two men and one woman, new in those minor details that make for realism with an added value of realistic atmosphere created by the treatment. It has all the appearance of being what young critics call "true to life." The primitive passions are closely akin to those with which other plays of the eternal triangle have made us familiar, but there is a departure in their manner of expression which becomes more marked in the philosophical resignation shown by leading characters at unexpected moments with high intensity at others. It also brings to attention ceremonials of betrothal and marriage which are probably survivals of very ancient customs, and some peculiar superstitions.

Mira, the daughter of a poor fisherman, is betrothed by her father to Owaru against her will, through a payment made by Owaru as a bride-price, showing that the idea of parental or kinsfolk ownership still prevails to an extent in the Island Empire. Mira has already fallen in love with Kenjiro, a young man of wealthy family and fine education, who later seeks her hand in marriage. His bride-price being larger than that paid by Owaru, her father throws over the first suitor in favor of the wealthy one, much to his daughter's delight.

Owaru does not attempt direct vengeance on his rival, nor even personal violence, but is accorded an opportunity to satisfy his hate by a combination of circumstances. The successful suitor is appointed to serve unmarried for one year as "Godmaster," a service involving isolation and intervention with the deity in behalf of the people. At a time the people are visited by a plague, Owaru contrives to visit his rival's hermitage and drug his food with a sleeping potion, thus interfering with the Godmaster's vigils. He then leads the people to believe that their sufferings are caused by Kenjiro's inattention to his duties.

Kenjiro is arrested, tried and convicted to the dismay of his betrothed, for he is sentenced to be flogged to death. All the resources of Mira's heart and mind are now roused to save her lover, and she visits Owaru in a guise that plays upon his weak mind. He flees in terror from the dreadful visitation, is struck by flying branches during a storm, and blinded. In this helpless condition he wanders to a cliff and falls over with fatal results. He confesses at the point of death, at the moment Kenjiro's dreadful execution is to take place, and restores Mira to the lover she has well deserved.

COMIC SECTIONS WORSE THAN BAD PICTURES.

"The Man From Home"

A Lasky Feature of the "Made in America" Sort—Enthusiastically Received at the Strand.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

HERE is a shining star in the Paramount sky. "The Man from Home" is a good deal more than a successful film feature. It is a veritable triumph of screen dramatization. It emphasizes in a thoroughly convincing manner that, as a medium of dramatic expression, the film has no metes and bounds. A play in which so much seemed to depend on the dialogue has been adapted for the screen absolutely without loss of any values either of dramatic action or of characterization.

I cannot help saying, apropos of this and other recent film plays, that nothing in our art has now been demonstrated more clearly than the success of the American-made high-class feature with a typically American plot and atmosphere. Such plays as "The Man from Home" are utterly impossible in the nickelodeon, but they are the very breath of life to the high-class theater which, all over the country, is rapidly coming into its own. For years I have been a careful observer of audiences, but never before did I see an audience so quickly drawn in sympathy to the screen as the audience in the Strand.

The keynote in the play is the inherent American love of truth and honesty, the American way of cutting the Gordian knot of European formalism and etiquette with the knife of wit and commonsense and the wholesome manliness of American men. The humor of it all is typically American. The flashes of wit and pathos in both titles and pictures had the audience in mighty good humor and there was much response by way of hearty and at times prolonged laughter.

The action of the play jumps from Kokomo, Ind., to Russia, then to Siberia, then to the German-Russian frontier and finally to Italy. Of course the motion picture alone can do justice to this sort of variety. The Italian scenes were so much like the genuine that an expert eye was needed to detect the beauties of the Californian landscape.

The story deals with the adventures of two young Americans, brother and sister, who came very near falling into the hands of English and Russian adventurers of the worst character. The prospect of marrying into a distinguished English family had somewhat confused the native American good sense of the couple. Happily the young American heiress had the right sort of guardian, an American country lawyer, a giant in figure with the best kind of a heart and a sincere affection for his ward. When it is proposed to turn three-quarters of a million dollars over to the prospective English bridegroom he balks and decides to leave his native Kokomo and take a personal look at the distinguished Europeans himself.

Here then starts the fine, rollicking humor of the play. Daniel Voorhees Pike (can you doubt his Hoosier origin), arriving in Southern Italy is shocked by the brutal way in which the Italian treats his animals. He promptly interferes on behalf of a tortured mule and thereby wins the regard and friendship of a Russian Grand Duke, sojourning in Naples. The Russian duke introduces himself as "Doctor Rollenhagen," whereupon Pike assures him he will hereafter call him "Doc." The Duke is a manly sort himself and between the two men there springs up a most charming friendship. All their joint adventures are tinctured with a spirit of fun and good fellowship, which is simply irresistible. The villains are duly exposed and the American heiress recovers her senses and marries Pike, whom she had loved when but a slip of a girl on her father's farm.

If there has ever been finer acting on the screen I have never seen it. Press agents having long ago pre-empted all superlatives I find myself hampered in doing these splendid artists justice. The performance of each was wonderfully well rounded out, masterfully complete in every detail. Charles Richman looked and acted exactly like the plain-dealing American of the Middle West, whom his neighbors want to run for Congress; Theodore Roberts as the Russian Grand Duke dominated every scene in which he appeared, he possessing the charming ease which is born of perfection; Horace B. Carpenter made an Ivanoff which will captivate every audience, both his art and his personality contributing to the success; Fred Montague was a convincing Earl of Hardcastle, while Dorothy Quincy did all that could be done with her part. The highest award of praise, however, it seems to me is due to Anita King, whose impersonation of the faithless wife of Ivanoff was the most finished piece of acting I have seen in a long time.

"The Brand of His Tribe."

Bison 101 Two-Reel Offering of Indian Story With Unusual Night Scenes and Plenty of Galloping and Firing.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THERE probably never will come the time when a reasonable number of Indian melodramas will not be welcome to spectators feeling the trammels of our modern, ledger-keeping city civilization. There was something in the expansiveness of pioneer days in the great American west that even to contemplate gives freedom for the time from the galling petty things one meets. The bigness of the freedom and the vim of the struggle are the antidotes.

Reviving the Indian and soldier romance, in this picture, "The Brand of His Tribe," which was produced by Henry McRae from Harry G. Stafford's script, the Bison 101 Company has attained novelty in one large group of scenes, which show a night attack of soldiers on the tepee village of the redmen, by actually photographing them at night. This has been done with astonishing success—at least we can plainly see the figures of Indians and their opponents darting here and there around them and can see the flashes of the firearms, and what is more the story doesn't suffer from the necessary obscurity of any struggle in the gloom of night.

The story deals with a half-breed son of an army officer who also becomes a West Point graduate and a lieutenant. The early scenes show how he happened to be born. His father is made a captive of the tribe and marries a squaw. The boy is branded with the mark of the tribe and when, later, his father is rescued, he too is taken to the fort and educated as a white man. The dramatic part of his story begins after his return from the Point when he has fallen in love with his captain's daughter. His blood is, of course, known and the girl's father objects. There is a passionate scene in which both of the young people rebel and after which the lieutenant throws away his sword and leaves the fort. The climax comes in the midst of a fresh Indian raid. The picture has many stirring incidents; it is well acted and has beautiful photography.

Gladys Hanson Gives Strong Characterization in Four-Part Famous Players' Subject.

THERE are strong scenes in the last half of the four-part Famous Players' adaptation of "The Straight Road," Clyde Fitch's drama. The first half entertains. For the major part of the story she is a resident of the slums, fighting against the lure of her besetting sin. She is given good support, especially by William Russell, Iva Shepard and Arthur Hoops. Mr. Russell has the role of "Bill" Hubbell, a saloon-keeper, not of the bad sort, either. Mr. Hoops has the "heavy" part, that of Douglas Aines, a man of means and position whose affections or what may take the place of them always go most strongly to the woman who happens to be nearest to him at the moment. Miss Shepard is Lazy Liz, a young woman who frequents saloons and who manifests at times the untamed, the fearless and the furious jealousy characteristic of her environment. Lorraine Huling is Ruth Thompson, the settlement worker, engaged to Aines. While she does not seem just the type of self-sacrificing woman we meet in real life, nevertheless she is interesting, vivacious, and in the stronger situations displays capacity for revealing emotion.

The opening scenes are of a "straight road," an allegorical bit which is effective. The death of the mother of Moll is portrayed in a small circle of light. The face is in the dark, the dissolution being indicated only in the convulsive working of the hands. The grewsome is acceptably minimized. We are early shown the wonderful restraining influences upon Moll of the picture of the "Mother of Sorrows." There are recurring scenes running through the story, all of them revelatory of the battle going on in the mind of the girl as she struggles toward the better path. The saloon scenes are lifelike. The training quarters for pugilists just off the back room of the rumshop are the backgrounds for comedy as well as dramatic situations. Real prizefighters are here, men who can take as well as give "wallops." The expositions of the "manly art" will go far toward adding to the popularity of the subject with the male portion of the house. It is all, however, a part of the story, and prepares us, by showing the saloon-keeper as something of a "scrapper" himself, for in the later struggle he throws Aines over his head and nearly kills him. The personal encounter between the two men matches in its intensity that between Moll and Liz.

"The Straight Road" does not depend on its exciting scenes for its value. There is much of the straight dramatic quality, particularly in the approach to the ending, where Moll is fighting to win the saloon-keeper and to avoid the pitfalls prepared for her by Aines. One of the best situations is contained in the scene where she exposes Aines' true character to his fiancee and unknowingly at the same time removes dark doubt from the mind of the man she loves. Moll has invited Aines to call on her at a stated hour. She also prevails upon the settlement worker, who firmly believes Moll has fallen from grace, to come to her home at that time. Ruth, outside the door, hears enough to convince her that Aines is thoroughly bad, and Moll all she should be.

"The Adopted Daughter"

Three-Reel Melodrama Featuring Ethel Grandin in a Double Role—Police Chief's Daughter and Slum Woman Look Alike.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

WHILE it is no new thing to have two characters exactly alike in a picture, to have one of them the cherished daughter of the city's chief of police and the other a woman of the darker slum-type is, we believe, quite fresh. The situation is exploited in a new Smallwood offering, "The Adopted Daughter," and to good effect. The story is very exciting, and when we note that the production is free from that trite expedient, the double exposure, we hardly need to add that the changing situation is handled freshly. It is indeed not only speedy, but almost crisp in its freshness. For instance, the detective-sweetheart of the chief's daughter is somewhat surprised to find his supposed sweetheart in a low gambling dive. The girl doesn't understand when he writes that "for reasons known to her" he must break his engagement.

She goes downtown to tell her father about it. Now the chief's activities against the gamblers have stirred up the police commissioner. He is merely the tool of a certain ward politician whose friends the gamblers are. The police commissioner enters the chief's office and sees her. He thinks her the slum girl and takes it for granted that she is "peaching" on the gang and that his affiliations with it will therefor be known. This opens at once another very tense situation and it is worked out along with the primary intention of the plot yet without in any measure lessening our interest in that part of the story. In the same way the plot unfolds several of these distinct yet clearly interlocked situations and from them the picture gets what may be termed an abundance of interest.

The complications of the story are no obstacle at all to its clearness. Without necessarily implying that the chance of doing something big that was afforded by this idea has been fully realized, we can safely say that the material has been handled with marked ability and much cleverness. One of the truly commendable things about the picture is the skill shown by its author and its producer in keeping the presence of the two women who are exactly alike and played by the same actress convincing. It was a much bigger achievement than having double exposures, an expedient that is growing trite to the point of becoming a handicap to a picture—double exposures are too often used for their own sake regardless of whether they are needed or not.

In acting, the picture is excellent, while the staging and the filming of the story is worthy. It makes a good offering.

DEATH OF WILLIAM KESSEL.

William Kessel, a pioneer film man and brother of Adam and Charles Kessel of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, died suddenly Friday, October 30, at 10 A. M., at his home, 179 Decatur street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Mr. Kessel was very well known in the manufacturing end of the film industry, at different times being a manufacturer, state rights buyer, exchange manager, exhibitor, and, in fact, director, and at the time of his death was doing confidential work for the New York Motion Picture Corporation. It was the late William Kessel's report on European affairs which guided the New York Motion Picture Corporation in its foreign policies, Mr. Kessel having only returned from Europe recently, after an extended tour. This is the second of the Kessel brothers to die in the past six months.

IN more than one of these Balboa pictures, the story has been woven around a gang of water-rat thieves and has been set in a very interesting background of rough huts and hovels built on the mud flats of a seaport town. It is a settling that suits an under-world story of rough adventure perfectly and the Balboa director seems to find unlimited variety and freshness in it. The activities going on around such a locality are well nigh inexhaustable furnishers of interest to pictures and even permit the use of plots that are fairly similar as to outline; for the possible filling-in taken from such an abundant source of novelty, keeps the story ever new and entertaining.

In "The End of the Bridge," a three-reel picture, the three central figures are a detective trying to break up a gang of wharf thieves, the pretty sister of one of the gang leaders, and her brother, who has heard a street preacher and is determined to lead a straight life. The parents of the girl keep a cheap stevedore boarding place and it is here that the detective meets her, he disguised as a rough dock-hand. Hot on the trail it is not long before he is chasing the brother who has just stolen, with the gang's help, a valuable necklace. This chase and the whole picture has been produced with snap and vigor. To escape, the gangster lets the necklace drop in the water. Later he is converted and the gang, fearing that he will tell its secrets tries to get him shanghaied on a ship. The detective and the girl, trying to save him, are chased—they are on a hand-car—by the gang leader on a horse. The draw-bridge is in the way and he forces the keeper to open it. The front wheels of the car had left the bridge and it is carried high up in the air. As we have said this and the other incidents of the story have been very ably handled and are full of marked suspense.

As usual in these Balboa offerings, the characters excite interest and sympathy; they have the popular touch and are clearly acted by personable players. One of the picture's things of special interest is the great suction dredge-pump that throws up the lost necklace. Then that cheap boarding-house is an excellent background and together with the hovels, the docks, the mud-flats and the ships, keep interest never flagging. The photography is excellent. A good offering.

"Fireproofing Children"

A Half Reel Photoplay Written by Dr. Pabst, Coroner's Physician, Showing Preventability of Burning Accidents.

WITH the object of reducing the large number of fatalities among children caused by burns, Dr. C. F. Pabst, of 396 Franklin avenue, Brooklyn, has supervised the production of a half-reel picture by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. The subject illustrates the proneness of children to be attracted to a flame, shows how one little girl's clothing catches fire, how a bystander saves her life, and then, most important of all, tells how children's garments may be made fireproof.

Dr. Pabst is coroner's physician for the Borough of Brooklyn, and in the line of duty one day last September he was called in at the death of five children, all of five years or under, who had been burned playing about bonfires. The little ones came from families in good circumstances as well as of poorer parents. The title of his picture is "Fireproofing Children," and will be released as a trailer under the Joker brand on November 14. It is approved by the American Society for Fire Prevention and the Public Safety Committees of many communities.

"My idea has been to illustrate the perils of children playing about bonfires," said Dr. Pabst the other day, "and also to show how easily preventable are these fatalities so common at this season of the year. Fireproofing of garments is so simple and can be done so cheaply that there is no excuse for overlooking it. Just take a pound of ammonium phosphate and dissolve it in a gallon of water. Soak a garment in that solution for five minutes, and it is fireproofed. It can be worn with absolute safety. Ammonium phosphate is a white crystal powder, resembling very much common salt. It is non-poisonous and is not patented in any way. It can be obtained at any drug store for 25 cents a pound. The solution does not injure the fabric any more than does pure water, and as its power remains indefinitely it can be used for several suits.

"To impress upon the public the need for this protection I wrote this photoplay. The opening scenes show several children playing around a bonfire near a large public school. One of the little girls, asked if she would be afraid to jump over the fire, takes the dare. Her clothing ignites. A passerby smothers the flames by wrapping the child in his coat and takes her home. A physician is called. Later, during the child's convalescence, her mother reads an article, urging parents to fireproof children's clothing and decides to give the method a trial. The process is carefully shown.

"There was some excitement when the picture was taken, many of the onlookers believing that Mildred Rankin, the child who was representing the victim of the bonfire, was badly burned. I had constructed a device of tin to fit under her clothing, however, and she was not hurt.

"The necessity of fireproofing children's clothing must be plain to all when we have twenty-one deaths from burns in less than a month. If one-half of the body is scorched we have what is described as a first degree burn and death is probable. The simple remedy to which I have tried to call attention is equally efficacious in the case of lace curtains, which have been the medium by which many fires have been started."

"The Coming Power"

Four Reel Melodrama of Politics and Business Versus the Girl with an Ideal.

Reviewed by the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton.

THIS picture by the Kinetophote Corporation will undoubtedly please many persons although it is hardly more than an average release. Some parts of it are rather crudely done and the arrest and jailing of the old bookkeeper by a private detective without a warrant evidences an ignorance of elementary legal procedure that makes this part of the story very unconvincing.

A very pleasing new twist to the story is the part played by Scene from "The Coming Down" (Kinetophote).

"the other woman" whose love for the gubernatorial candidate and hero makes her first try to lead him astray and then unexpectedly turn around and become the means of his salvation. Anna Rose, who plays the part, has done some excellent work here and despite a little overacting gets quite an appeal into the character she represents. William Crimmins, who plays the part of the bad, big-business man, has also done some very creditable work and his command of facial expression is at times remarkable. Edith Luckert, however, who plays the part of the crippled girl with the ideal from whom the hero draws his inspiration, deserves the greatest credit. Her part is an extremely difficult one owing to the fact that she is called upon throughout the whole play to sit absolutely still in an invalid chair and must get her part over entirely by her facial expressions and the action of her hands. She does it too.

The court room scenes are decidedly novel and realistic due to the fact that a real judge presided and overdirected the scenes, himself taking the part of the judge, and his histrionic ability is well evidenced by the fact that his acting really looks like the genuine article.

"Lola"

A Woman Whose Soul Has Been Claimed by Death, But Whose Body Still Lives, Is Played by Clara Kimball Young.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

SPECTATORS of a mystical turn of mind may find in this picture an idea of startling interest. Its central character is a young and beautiful woman, whose face is not more lovely in its grace than is her character; for sympathy and a heart of charity have endeared her to all about her. "Everybody loves Lola," is remarked by the servant girl.

She is knocked down by an automobile and carried back to her father's house a lifeless corpse. Her father is a doctor and she is pronounced dead by his confrere, a famous physician, at the time visiting them. But the girl's father, though obscure, has discovered a machine that will recall life to the dead. The body is laid out on the operating table and the current applied. The muscles of the face relax, the eyelids tremble and the girl lives once more.

A few days before this terrible accident and marvelous restoration, the doctor had been showing the apparatus to the girl's fiance. He was horror-stricken at the thought of recalling the body to life after the soul had gone. It must be confessed that the man failed to get strong sympathy for this objection; but now, as life is coming back into the girl, we discern that the author's intention had been to have the spectator accept the fear; for a vague shadow of Death is seen hovering over the still body and even while life is once again flowing in the girl, Death exacts the soul whom he carries away, leaving only the form of Lola to her friends.

In the opening scenes we were shown that Lola had been attracted by two lovers, one a rather questionable individual, the other all that a fine girl would choose and it was to the latter that she gave her affections. Not when no soul is mistress of her will, a demon seems to have entered the empty dwelling, her beautiful body. Soon we hear the servant exclaiming in astonishment and fear, "Lola, how terribly you have changed!" She is such that when, after she has wrecked the happiness of two or three men, has developed heart disease and dies, her father refuses to resuscitate her a second time.

The cast is a very strong one. Clara Kimball Young plays with her usual discrimination and ease the rather difficult role of Lola. Frank Holland portrays the character of her accepted fiance from whom she turns after her soul leaves her. The wilder man to whom she then goes is taken by James Young. Alec Francis takes the part of the father of the girl. If the offering has any particular weakness, it lies in the idea more than in the development or staging. With many it may appeal as a startling and deeply entertaining offering.

Mr. Mallouf says that he will handle only such features as are produced with skill and will be acceptable to the better class of motion picture houses He expects to start upon a tour of the East in a short time to secure business and to renew his acquaintance with old friends in the trade. She and her friend, the stage manager try to find out the secret and put a camera in her dressing-room where the experiments are going on. A pistol is lying on the table. There is a tussle; a glass of chemical spills on the pistol and it goes off, killing the actress. The police break in and find a bit of watch chain (his) in the dead woman's hand; but George has fled by the window. The camera has taken a half dozen plates and shows the struggle; but only those pictures that will incriminate George are sent to the police by the rival and the stage manager.

George in his laboratory, looking for an incriminating letter, knocks over a bottle of chloroform and lies as dead on the floor. His father, who knows all, finds George and tells the police that he is dead; but when they have left he, conscience stricken, revives the young man and calls the police to return. This situation is, so far as we know, quite new in pictures and it is most certainly interesting. The police now have George; but in trying to find who it was that sent the anonymous photographs discover broken bits of the other plates. These when printed and pieced together show just how the accident happened and George is freed.

The picture has some very pretty scenes, excellently lighted and perfectly photographed. Some of the characters are strongly acted—not all. Several of the picture's situations are deeply interesting.

LEONA HUTTON IN "A CROOK'S SWEETHEART."

Leona Hutton, leading woman at Inceville, emphatically declares that she has never made an analytical study of the lower type of women. And yet one of her most remarkable accomplishments is that of interpreting the part of a woman of the underworld. She has demonstrated this fact by her splendid work in "A Crook's Sweetheart," an Ince production soon to be released. Mr. Ince has repeatedly cast Miss Hutton in characters of this kind and she has never murmured an objection. When players at the Inceville studios had seen her work in "A Crook's Sweetheart," in the title role, they complimented her, but added that she certainly must have made a deep study of such women. Their statements, however, were met with the reply that she never even read a "shilling shocker." "I have lived out west practically all my life," says Miss Hutton, "and the west never has been the stamping ground of criminally-inclined women."

Lasky Secures Valeska Suratt

ANOTHER recruit to the ranks of prominent stars to the photoplay realm, occurred last week when General Manager Samuel Goldfish of the Lasky Feature Play Company secured the signature to a long-term contract of the popular star, Valeska Suratt.

Miss Suratt, considered the most sensationally esthetic of stage women, probably lavishes more money on her attire than any other star. When "Bouffe Varieties" were produced by Miss Suratt, in which she was supported by twenty-five prominent players, the vaudeville world accorded her the palm for elaborateness. Her "Black Crepe and Diamonds," which served as a vehicle all last season, cost in the neighborhood of forty thousand dollars for hanging pieces and costumes alone.

Valeska Suratt.

The contract with the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company wherein Miss Suratt obligates her services to that firm for a period of two years, contains many clauses in which the employing concern subjects itself to no little opportunity to squander money, if Miss Suratt's whimsicalities lean toward her vaudeville desires. The contract stipulates that her first picture must be a modern society subject, staged in the proper environment and that Miss Suratt is to select her own costumes, gown and the habilament of the surrounding players.

The contract runs from Nov. 1, 1914, to November 30, 1916, and gives the Lasky people the exclusive rights to her services for as many pictures as they desire to make. The Suratt pictures will be staged at the Lasky studio, Hollywood, California, by Cecil B. De Mille.

FOX ENGAGES ROBERT EDESON.

William Fox has again delved into the ranks of the legitimate and drawn forth another brilliant star in the person of Robert Edeson, who will appear in a screen version of David Belasco's "The Girl I Left Behind Me," one of the most successful dramas produced under the management of Charles Frohman in the early Empire theatre days. The nature of the story is ideal for film purposes. Mr. Fox, with characteristic enterprise, has selected Lloyd B. Carleton, formerly of the Frohman producing staff, to direct the photoplay.

Western Picturemen in Town

Messrs. Payne and Beyfuss, of the California Motion Picture Corporation, Sojourn at the Ritz-Carleton.

HERBERT PAYNE, president, and Alexander E. Beyfuss, general manager of the California Motion Picture Corporation, of San Francisco, Cal., spent a few days at the Ritz-Carleton Hotel, New York City, last week. Mr. Payne had just returned from Europe and Mr. Beyfuss came on from San Francisco bringing with him prints of the second production made by his company, "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." This picture with "Salomy Jane" were exhibited privately at the Alco office for the benefit of Mr. Payne that he might see the changes that had been made in his absence.

Mr. Payne told an interesting story of the manner in which he got into the motion picture business. He is a member of a very wealthy family in San Francisco and is known at home as the millionaire sportsman of Menlo Park, Cal. His desire to make some use of a good corner lot on Sutter street, San Francisco, induced him to build a commodious picture theater thereon, now known as the Sutter Street Theater. Just previous to that he had experimented with a smaller house and had done a little work with a motion picture camera, producing scenes of local events.

These experiments induced Mr. Payne to embark in the picture business upon a larger scale and, getting in touch with Mr. Beyfuss, a live wire among men of affairs in San Francisco, it was decided to go into picture production in earnest. Interesting friends and business associates of the Payne family, the California Motion Picture Corporation was launched. Henry T. Scott, chairman of the Board of Directors of the Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Company, President of the Mercantile Bank of San Francisco, and a Director of the Bank of Burlingame, the Crocker National Bank, the Oakland, Antioch and Eastern Railway Company and the United Railroads of San Francisco, became vice-president and treasurer. Charles Templeton Crocker, president of the Crocker Hotel Company and director of the Crocker National Bank, was glad to become a member of the Board of Directors of the California Motion Picture Corporation. Arthur Payne, brother of President Payne and Secretary of the Payne Estate Company, and Christian De Guigne, of the Parrott Estate Company, also became members of the Board.

Then the work of organizing the forces which were to portray the spirit of the golden west began. The best camera men obtainable were hired and the best directors. A strong company was at once engaged for the initial production "Salomy Jane," headed by Beatriz Michelena as the star. While the company was being selected, business agents of the California Motion Picture Corporation had purchased a large tract of land on the outskirts of San Rafael, which is about as far from San Francisco as some of the more distant towns of Staten Island. Eight acres were set aside for studio and laboratory purposes. The entire tract, available for production purposes, presents an unusual variety of scenery. In the near distance is Mount Tamalpais. Muir Woods, Mill Valley, the Russian River, the famous redwood groves, are some of the scenic accessories which may be reached easily from the California studio. To go from San Francisco to San Rafael, it is only necessary to take the ferry across the bay to Sausalito and then travel by rail along the shores of the bay to San Rafael.

The result of all this organization and preparation is shown in the company's first release, "Salomy Jane." Equally good, if not better results are promised for "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." These results, Mr. Beyfuss declares, are due to the great care in the matter of detail which marks every effort made by the company's directors and cameramen.

Following "Mrs. Wiggs," Mr. Beyfuss said that it was the intention of his company to return to Western themes. "We are native Californians, filled with the spirit of California and we wish to present to the world in photoplay form in such a way that it will live, the heart and essence of California and the West."

LEDERER MAKING "THE FIGHT."

George W. Lederer has started on his film production of Bayard Vellier's "The Fight" at the company's studio in Fort Lee, N. J. Miss Wycherly, for whom the original play was written, will play the lead and will be supported by John E. Kellerd, Katherine LaSalle, Sonia Massell, Albert Gran, Gertrude Cameron, Chas. Trowbridge, Edna Hibbard, Timothy J. Cronin, Jeanette Bageard, Jane Harvey, Wilbur C. Hudson, Richard J. Riley and many others.

Morosco and Cort Enter Picture Field

AS a further indication of the remarkable development of the feature film, it is now officially announced that two such prominent theatrical producers as John Cort and Oliver Morosco, under the name of the Oliver Morosco Photo Play Company, have at last entered the film producing field, having just affected an affiliation with Frank A. Garbutt, of Bosworth, Inc., one of the leading film producers of the world.

This is one of the most significant alliances ever affected between important theatrical and motion picture interests, and attaches greater prestige to Bosworth, Inc., by reason of the fact that these producers have been approached at various times by the leading motion picture producers of the country with flattering offers for a similar junction of interests, and the selection of Bosworth, Inc., by these prominent producers to present their long list of dramatic successes in motion pictures indicates the high regard in which this concern is held in dramatic and theatrical circles.

Among the more prominent dramatic triumphs that have been produced by John Cort and Oliver Morosco, which will now be presented to the motion picture public are "Peg O' My Heart," "Bird of Paradise" and "Help Wanted."

As is commonly known, Bosworth, Inc., together with the Famous Players Film Co. and the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Co., comprise the Paramount Pictures Corporation, the greatest feature program ever conceived in motion pictures. The Famous Players Film Co. are affiliated with Daniel and Charles Frohman, and Henry W. Savage. The Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Co. are associated with David Belasco and The Liebler Company, and with the addition of John Cort and Oliver Morosco in association with the Bosworth, Inc., as reported above, it may be now positively stated that the Paramount Program will now distribute the dramatic output of the greatest number of powerful theatrical producers that ever contributed to a single film program.

Judging this combination in its larger sense, it can be readily seen that the affiliation of these three film producing companies with several of the world's foremost theatrical producers, all gathered on a single feature program, marks the greatest amalgamation of the film and the legitimate drama ever affected.

"The Girl and the Explorer"

Pleasing Romantic Comedy Featuring Marguerite Courtot—Story Is as Light-Hearted as Eternal Youth.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

A ROMANTIC comedy at its best is of web and texture like those cobwebs one finds on some sunny lawn in May, all covered over with dew. The moment when a violet opens, the song of a bird, the laugh of young hearts in first love—can a picture be made that shall set forth only these things? It can be, and it's a mighty joyous thing when it's made. This new Kalem offering in two reels, "The Girl and the Explorer," is dedicated to things solely of this kind, and it does achieve a pleasing insouciance, especially in the first reel. It has imperfections; but the gladness of it, as a whole, makes the spectator gladly forgive its blemishes. It's a good offering.

The leading role is taken by Marguerite Courtot, whose face with its unspoiled sweetness, makes her a perfect heroine for this kind of story. She plays the daughter of a rich magazine publisher who knows how much her father and his competitors want the exclusive rights in the narrative of a young explorer (Tom Moore). The picture has shown us how the boyish explorer had escaped in disguise through the toils of the reporters. The papers have announced that he did not come on the Adriatic after all. She has seen his picture, recognizes him at a window, and rings the door bell. The cook asks if she is the new maid and she says she is. The story, which has its logical ending, is helped along in its romantic comedy atmosphere very greatly indeed by the explorer's Japanese valet, played by Makoto Inokuchi. Mr. Inokuchi is a strong player.

As we have pointed out, one is at times willing to be charitable with such things as a wedding over the telephone, which the author of this picture uses as an easy way out of one of his difficulties, and it is because one likes the picture. But the fact that such a thing is in the story shows that, if more time had been used over it, it would have been even better. The author of the script is C. Doty Hobart, and Tom Moore is responsible for its staging. Both are surely worthy of commendation.

GREAT NORTHERN HAS NOVEL DETECTIVE DRAMA.

The Great Northern Film Company's latest release is a three-reel feature entitled "The Charlotte Street Mystery." As the name implies, it is a detective drama, and one containing some novel and startling effects. The story is replete with exciting episodes, dealing with the interesting adventures of an exceptionally clever woman who seeks to elude the law and succeeds in baffling a shrewd detective for some time, but is finally captured, after several thrilling escapes.

The role of the woman is in the hands of the capable Great Northern leading woman, Miss Elsie Frolich, who gives a very vivid characterization. All of the other parts are also well played. The picture as a whole is an attractive production. One of the big scenes is the detective's chase in pursuit of the fugitives. The latter are escaping in a taxi and the detective hurries after them on a motorcycle. They catch a steamer just as it is departing but the detective charers a motor boat and overtakes them.

Robert Brower

ROBERT BROWER, who is known from the Atlantic to the Pacific as the "Grand Old Man of the Movies," was born in Point Pleasant, N. J., on July 14, 1850. At the tender age of six months he was brought to New York City by his parents and has lived the sixty-four years of his life in the great Metropolis. Like many other actors of world-wide reputation, Robert Brower made his initial appearance in the theatrical limelight at the famous Niblo's Garden before he had reached his teens. At the age of sixteen he went to Booth's Theater and was connected with Edwin Booth and the celebrated Shakespearean actor George Rignold. He then toured the world in a managerial capacity, notably with D. P. Bowers, John McCullough, John Ward and John H. Stoddard, and the tremendous success of such productions as "The Silver King," "The Lights of London" and "Under the Bonnie Briar Bush" may be attributed to the untiring energy and unceasing devotion of Mr. Brower.

Robert Brower.

In 1909, after a long and successful season, the failing health of his wife necessitated his abandoning the stage life in order that he might be at her side and attend to her every want. It was then he joined the Edison Company and during the past five years he has been called upon to impersonate more than fifteen hundred characters. Mr. Brower's performance in the "Harbinger of Peace," in which he played the role of the old man, was so heart-touching that it brought forth many letters of congratulation to him from the fans, addressed "The Grand Old Man of the Movies." He will also be remembered as the retired pork packer in "My Friend from India," the Chinese mandarin in "The Story of the Willow Pattern" and Superintendent Narkom of Scotland Yard in "The Chronicles of Cleek."

These afford an excellent example of his versatility, ranging as they do from melodrama to farce comedy, for such indeed is the scope of Mr. Brower's genius. His sympathetic expression and ability to forget himself entirely in no matter what character he may be portraying have earned for Mr. Brower the love and admiration of all who delight in the histrionic film.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

FIRST UNIVERSAL BOOKING OFFICE RELEASE.

It has been decided that the first release of the Universal Booking Office is to be "Damon and Pythias," a six-part production of the feature variety. The purpose of the new Booking Office is to take charge of all Universal productions of five reels in length or more. The great success of "Neptune's Daughter" proved to President Laemmle that there was an opening for such a service and the new office was instituted accordingly.

Scene from "Damon and Pythias" (Universal).

The story of "Damon and Pythias" is too well known to require repetition here. The manner in which the story has been reproduced in pictures by the Universal players will arouse a new interest in that story. Otis Turner was the director and under his skillful hand whole cities were built, Grecian gardens and magnificent baths were constructed to create the proper locale for such an undertaking. There were sensational chariot races, great armies clashed and cities were set on fire to give the necessary thrill to the story.

Among the players who took part in this subject were Cleo Madison, Anna Little, Henry Worthington, Herbert Rawlinson and Frank Lloyd, who carried the principal parts and who were assisted by fully a thousand trained players.

Knights of Pythias all over the United States and Canada have endorsed the film, recommending that everyone see it and digest its wonderful moral. In each case the production has been proclaimed "one of the most wonderful pieces of work ever witnessed."

This feature will be shown simultaneously in New York, San Francisco, Boston, Chicago, and other large cities, following which the Booking Offices will send the various shown on tour, to be exhibited in the highest class theaters in the country.

FAMOUS PLAYERS TO PRESENT EDWARD ABELES IN "THE MILLION."

Edward Abeles, star of "Brewster's Millions," "Charley's Aunt," "My Friend from India," and a long list of other celebrated stage successes, is now engaged in the production of his first subject for the Famous Players Film Co. The vehicle selected for Mr. Abeles' first appearance on the Famous Players program is "The Million," Henry W. Savage's great comedy production, and is presented as the second Famous Players-Henry W. Savage release.

Edward Abeles will play the role of the "Baron" in "The Million," the clever and kind-hearted crook whose ingenious manouvers finally succeed in capturing the much-sought-for lottery ticket, the recovery of which means the marriage of the two young lovers of the play.

Mr. Abeles is a past master of comedy and the art of make-up, and is therefore especially well-chosen for the part of "The Baron," whose wonderful and varied disguises not only deceive the police, but his own friends and acquaintances as well, and which contribute greatly to the humor of the play.

A unique feature of the cast is the fact that the star and his entire male support are all members of the Lambs Club, which may be said to make the production one that exhibitors can "gambol" on.

"The Million" is scheduled for release on the Paramount program December 31.

"THE LITTLE GIRL THAT HE FORGOT" (Cosmos).

Following "Hearts and Flowers," the Cosmos Feature Film Corporation will release "The Little Girl That He Forgot." This will be a photoplay in five parts. Miss Beulah Poynter will appear in the title role of this, her own play. Incidentally it may be mentioned in the same breath that Miss Poynter has written a novel along the same lines, which will shortly be published.

"Lena Rivers," with Miss Poynter in the title role, is going big wherever shown. The exact release date for "Hearts and Flowers" will be announced shortly.

"THE LADY OF LYONS" (Sawyer).

Sawyer, Inc., announce that they will shortly release "The Lady of Lyons," a four-reel feature based on the famous drama of the same name by Lord Bulwer Lytton, which had its first stage production in 1837, and which has since been played more than four thousand times, in every civilized country of the world.

"The Lady of Lyons" is a fascinating love story that splendidly lends itself to cinema production because of the briskness of action throughout and the final happy ending. It can really be called a comedy, for though there are many situations of dramatic intensity, the underlying principle of the story is to entertain, and that it certainly does.

The company engaged in the production have interpreted the conception of the author with great fidelity. Their action is natural, unstilted and free from staginess, and plays with a finesse that gives to the drama a singularly convincing character.

Exceptionally beautiful paper and other advertising devices are being prepared for this production by the Sawyer Publicity Department.

LESSER GETS "CABIRIA" FOR THE COAST.

Sol Lesser wired the Moving Picture World under date of November 10 to the effect that he had secured the rights on "Cabiria" for the Coast. Mr. Lesser is president and general manager of the Golgate Feature Service. His coup in capturing this greatest of modern photoplays should be of inestimable value to his company. Mr. Lesser is to be congratulated upon this stroke of enterprise.

"UNREST" (Selig).

On November 30 the Selig Polyscope Company will release a two-reel picture, possessing unusual qualities, which will be of special interest to exhibitors.

It is a psychological drama from the pen of W. E. Wing, whose comedies are well and favorably known to exhibitors, but "Unrest" is along different lines than his customary writings. The story deals with a young man who has a luxurious home, but whose inclinations cause him to seek the companionship of disreputables.

Thomas Santschi and Bessie Eyton are featured in "Unrest," while Harry Lonsdale, Joe Hazelton and Roy Watson appear in minor parts. "Unrest" was produced in the Selig Western Studio, under the direction of Thomas Santschi.

"THE MARRIAGE WAGER" (Lubin).

This is a strongly romantic and dramatic picture which, tho' modern, has a medieval atmosphere and would have fitted a tale of the Fifteenth Century. Two brothers quarrel over the disposition of the family fortune and the weaker tho' richer one has to seek safety in a foreign country and protect his money in the vault of an old mansion he has bought. The disgruntled brother tracks the other and discovers the hidden treasure room and a tragedy eventuates. There is a romantic love episode in the story which lightens the melodrama and ends in kisses and happiness.

The story is written by Shannon Fife and cast with an excellent company including John E. Ince, Justina Huff, John Smiley and other favorites of the Lubin home studio.

HORSLEY OPENS CAFE DE CENTAUR.

Following his policy of making his plant entirely self-contained, David Horsley will open by Monday, November 16, a restaurant for the employees at the big studio and factory of the Centaur Film Manufacturing Company at Bayonne, N. J. The restaurant building has been erected in a corner of the studio yard and the installation of fixtures is being rushed.

The new restaurant will have a total seating capacity of about one hundred and will afford both counter and table service. The manager will be Charles Brown, a prominent restaurateur of Westchester County, N. Y., who has conducted several safes in the Bronx and Westchester.

RELIANCE THRILLER PROMISED.

A gripping story of an attempt to steal valuable government timber lands is the principal theme in the Reliance thriller, "The Forest Thieves," written by Arthur Chapman and produced by "Sheriff" Arthur Mackley at the R. and M. Mutual studios. The plot deals with the scheme of a millionaire to bribe the forest supervisior to make dummy entries so that he can steal a valuable tract of timber. A young forest ranger frustrates the scheme, exposes the plotters and, incidentally, wins the love of the pretty postmistress. Bob Barnes, George Seigmann and Florence Crawford are the principals in "The Forest Thieves," which will be released through the Mutual program.

"LORD CECIL KEEPS HIS WORD" (Lubin).

This is the tenth episode in the interesting series that the Lubin Company are releasing weekly. In it the Beloved Adventurer gets another setback, but immediately recoups his love affair with Betty and his fortune is permanently established. The followers of the exciting story will be delighted to see that virtue is duly rewarded and the mutual enemy is beautifully beaten at his own game. Betty's love is so strong that she throws aside the conventional and really proposes that she may become Lady Cecil. The worthy couple hasten to Gretna Green, over the Scottish border, and return to spend a delightful honeymoon at Croftlaigh Manor. There are five more episodes of the series to be released, all of which are intensely dramatic and prove Lord Cecil well worthy of the sobriquet "The Beloved Adventurer."

COMMERCIAL BIOPHONE CO. EXTENDS SERVICE.

Arrangements have just been completed whereby the Commercial Biophone Co., of 110 West 40th street, New York City, takes over the contract formerly held by Pathe Freres, controlling the entire output for the United States and Canada of the world renowned productions of Messter and Autor Films of Berlin, including the Hennie Porten Series, which met with instant success wherever shown. It has not yet been decided through what channels these films will be released, but the first shipment of sample prints has arrived and announcements to the trade may be expected in the near future.

"SCARS OF POSSESSION" (Essanay).

"Scars of Possession" is a striking and unique drama, in which a young girl vows to wed a young man whom she has never seen but who has saved her life through an operation, by which his blood has been transfused into her veins. The operation scene is realistically portrayed, it having been made under the direction of a surgeon, just as it would take place in a hospital. The girl in the play afterwards falls in love with a young man, but refuses to marry him, because of her vow to wed the man who gave her his blood. The suitor for her hand hears of this vow, and shows a scar on his arm that he is the man. Friday, Nov. 27, is the release date.

KERRIGAN RENEWS CONTRACT.

It is with great pleasure that the Universal Film Manufacturing Company announces the signing of a new contract with Jack Kerrigan, of the Kerrigan-Victor company, which covers a period of two years. While Mr. Kerrigan's popularity is too well known to require any particular word, it is interesting just at this time to learn that during his work with the Universal company, that he had been awarded first prize in three contests and second and third in seven others. He is at present working on a series by Louis Joseph Vance, called "Terrence O'Rourke," which promises to overshadow all the other work he has done since his connection with the company.

Jacques Jaccard will continue to act as co-director with Mr. Kerrigan in the production of the future releases.

ESPERANTO COMPANY REORGANIZE.

The office and working staff of the Esperanto Feature Film Company, in Detroit, has been reorganized. Louis Myll, formerly stage director for George Kleine, and for fifteen years on the legitimate stage, and associated as stage director and manager of productions for David Belasco, has been appointed general manager and director of the Esperanto company. The company has moved from its original quarters in the Terminal Building to 222 Monroe avenue, where it will have its general offices and studio for producing purposes. It will also retain its studio in Woodward avenue. Mr. Myll is now making plans for a new production which will be started this month. Considerable new apparatus has been purchased and the company is in shape to proceed with its work.

NOVEL DOUBLE EXPOSURE IN MUTUAL GIRL No. 43.

An interesting bit of double exposure was recently performed in "Our Mutual Girl," Reel 43, which has deviated somewhat from the paths of the former reels, inasmuch as Miss Norma Phillips, who plays the part of Margaret the Mutual Girl, admirably portrays two parts in this installment. The scenes are laid in a silk mill in Paterson, N. J., and deals with a striking resemblance between Margaret and the factory forewoman. Margaret, when she discovers this resemblance, decides to uncover a plot laid to destroy the finances of her sweetheart.

The particularly interesting double exposures are when the forewoman, which is played by Margaret, passes in front of Margaret herself as the Mutual Girl.

New Ticket Device

Automatic Ticket Selling and Cash Register Company's Latest Apparatus Is Simple, Compact and Rapid.

AT THE offices of the Automatic Ticket Selling and Cash Register Company in the Longacre Building this week Messrs. E. S. Bowman and S. H. Deroy demonstrated to a World man their company's new device for selling tickets. The apparatus is simple, compact and rapid. Among its chief claims to recognition is the avoidance of the foot lever, one of the factors in the operation of the earlier machine of this company. As it is now, by the pressing of one of five buttons ranged closely side by side the ticket or tickets fly out to the customer. It may be one or two, or any number up to five. By holding down the key the admission slips pour out in a stream. The device is speeded up to 140 tickets a minute, far in excess of any possible requirements. If a house have more than one price for its tickets a duplicate machine is placed alongside with a different colored ticket. In the Greeley Square Theater, in New York, for instance, a quadruple outfit has been installed.

The tickets are placed in a locked magazine carrying 4,000 admissions. The ticket seller has no access to these unless it be the wish of the manager. An adding device, also under a key, registers the total number of sales, enabling a manager at any time of the day or evening to take a record of his business. By obviating the foot lever, which has been a cause of complaint on the part of ticket sellers, the person in the box office can give practically all of his attention to making change. The construction is of straight line parts, of the simplest possible mechanism. "In fact," said one of the officers of the company, "It is foolproof. We guarantee its construction and perfect operation." The slight oiling necessary is done at one point. The knives for cutting the tickets are by the scissors arrangement, automatically kept in condition. The officers pointed out that in spite of the advance of this machine over its predecessor the price is approximately the same.

The company, which was swamped with orders on its initial demonstrations, is now catching up and is prepared to make prompt deliveries. Mr. Doroy, who has just returned to New York from Los Angeles, where he was in charge of the west coast offices of the company, reports that he has equipped all of the houses of the Turner & Dahnken circuit with the new device.

FOX AGREES WITH BUSH.

"I am not in favor of the salacious or the sex drama, either in pictures or on the stage," said William Fox, president of The Box Office Attraction Company, in discussing the excellent review of "Life's Shop Window," published under the signature of W. Stephen Bush in The Moving Picture World. "I am entirely in accord with the views of Mr. Bush. I have been showing pictures in the most exclusive sections of New York and New England for the last decade. I have demanded the best—have always fought for the best. No person can say truthfully that they have seen a questionable picture on the screen in any of my theaters. Many have asked me why I do not sell liquor at the Danse D'Hiver and at The Rivera. They have argued that I would clean up a big pile if I did. I have always told them that I don't want that kind of money. I don't want to cater to the class that regard alcoholic drinks as a necessary dancing inspiration. This clean policy has brought the best people in New York to my theaters and dance halls. As a showman I have tried to analyze this unprecedented success. Is it the reputation of the story, the advertising, or is it one of those intangible flukes that no one can explain. I said before the patronage of the Audubon and the Nemo could not be influenced by a sordid curiosity. Personally I think the picture is winning on its merits."

A CIRCUS UTILIZED IN "ZUDORA."

An entire circus outfit, horses, wagons, tight-ropes and tents were used in the first episode of "Zudora," Thanhouser's forthcoming serial.

The wagons loaded with the impedimenta of the road circus, the pulling and hauling of "props," the tight-rope stretched across the ring, all were in place. Even the side show barkers, busy with their "Ballyhooing," had their place in the scene, which on the screen is cut almost to a flash.

Director Frederick Sullivan was so anxious to give full justice to the circus atmosphere that, despite the expense, and the shortness of the scene, an entire circus outfit was used. The effect on the screen is strikingly realistic and the viewer will just naturally imagine the cries of the fakirs and the blatant trumpeting of the circus band.

Notes of the Trade

LEWIS C. DURHAM, heavy man with the Ince companies, furnished the moving picture colony a pleasant surprise at Los Angeles on October 20th, when he renounced bachelorhood and led to the altar Miss Edith Carmen Smithman, the beautiful and accomplished daughter of Mr and Mrs Henry Smithman. The marriage ceremony was solemnized, in the presence of a few intimate friends, by Rev. Baker P. Lee, pastor of Christ Church, at the Angel City.

"The Rosary" has added another week's growth to its interesting structure. The Selig feature is growing more fascinating as Director Colin Campbell's all-star company unfolds the story for film purposes. Unusual sets characterize a portion of this production. Hand-carved interiors, announcing early days in America, rich tapestry, genuine fire-places of great age, secured at great expense, and many striking outdoor locations are adding much to the atmosphere of this rare motion picture.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

ACTING SECRETARY LANSING, of the State Department, recently issued a statement wherein he announced that his department declined to "act as censor" of motion picture films based on the European war. Mr. Lansing was very indignant when advised of the action of a film concern in advertising such a film claimed to have had the State Department's permission for its presentation.

Motion picture films are playing a prominent part in the instruction of members of the National Guard of the District of Columbia, the states and territories, and an exhibition was given here last week for the benefit of the officers and enlisted men of the First Battery, Field Artillery, of the guard. The films are real pictures of the United States cavalry in action simulating service conditions. Dashing horses are shown dragging heavy field pieces over the snow covered country; the planting of guns as they prepare for delivering their charges in the face of the enemy, the action of the officers and men in the actual firing, and even the bursting of shrapnel at the targets, and the keen marksmanship of the American gunners are all shown in the three reels which were specially prepared during the target practice at Fort Sill, Oklahoma. They were brought to Washington and a first exhibition was given for the benefit of the officers on duty at the Army War College, and considerable comment was there made on the value of the films from an educational standpoint. Practically all of the types of field artillery used by the United States force are shown. The second exhibition before the National Guard was open to the general public.

The property occupied by the Columbia Amusement Company, Inc., in which is located the Olympic theater, has changed hands in a trade made by the former owner with Frank G. Davidson. The property is valued at in the neighborhood of $42,000. The change of ownership will in no way affect the lease of the amusement company.

The management of the Florida Moving Picture theater, at Fifteenth and H streets, Northeast, is circularizing the neighborhood surrounding that theater in an effort to form a stock company to operate the house. The circular states that "Owing to the erection of four other theaters in the Northeast since the Florida was projected receipts have had a severe jolt, and the $3,000 a year rent comes heavy. It is a matter of but a few years until the junction of seven thoroughfares will make Fifteenth and H the busiest semi-suburban center around Washington. The Florida theater was planned to meet this growth and can be enlarged at a small cost from 410 to 740 seats on its own lot." It is claimed that under present dull conditions the Florida is paying in the neighborhood of 20 per cent. and that it can be made to pay 40 per cent. Accompanying the circular were two tickets for admission to the theater.

It is reported that Washington is to have still another up-to-date moving picture theater which will be built more along the lines of the legitimate houses than any previously projected. Rumor has it that the theater will be equipped with upholstered leather chairs and all other modern conveniences.

Among the visitors in Washington were Harry Church, who operates the Bonita theater in Norfolk, Va., who came here in search of good features; J. L. Sharp, and Mr. Gilson, of Richmond, Va.

J. A. Koerper, from the New York office, has succeeded S. J. Mayer as manager of the local office of the General Film Company. He will be assisted by John J. Payette, who was appointed assistant manager of the Washington exchange some months ago.

Victor L. Abbey, who has been in charge of the bookkeeping department of the Washington office of Warner's Features, Inc., has been appointed assistant manager of that branch and in relinquishing his former duties will assume those of booker and roadman.

Samuel M. Flax, formerly booker and roadman for Warner's Features, Inc., has accepted a similar position with the Eclectic Feature Film Exchange.

It is reported that James and W. S. Wickham have secured a lease for the Dixie theatre, at Eighth and H streets Northeast, and intend opening that house within a week or two.

The Griffin Sisters have taken over the Fairyland (colored) theater, on L street, between Eighteenth and Nineteenth streets, Northwest, and will give a vaudeville show, in which they will themselves participate, in addition to a motion picture exhibition. The house was formerly operated by Brooks & Ross.

Lillie Airey, who formerly managed the Alhambra theater on Seventh street, and who is now operating the Apollo theater for the National Amusement Company in Martinsburg, W. Va., was in town last week booking up features and visiting many of his friends.

It is reported that a regular exhibition of motion pictures is to be given in the hall of the Catholic school at Harper's Ferry, W. Va., and that the Rev. F. C. Curran visited Washington with a view to securing suitable service therefor.

Other visitors here were C. E. Koontz, who is operating in the Masonic Hall in Gaithersburg, Md.; Mr. Wertheimer, of Cumberland, Md.; Mrs. Thorpe, of Richmond, Va., and F. O. Webber, who operates the Amusu and Comet, in Roanoke, Va.

The Cosmos theater last week began the showing of the reel taken at the moving picture ball held the latter part of October in Convention Hall, and it is said that this will then be turned over to the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the District of Columbia to be rented out among its members, the funds thus obtained to go into its treasury. Although the pictures are rather poor in photography, showing an improper concentration of the lights, they will prove a drawing card and the exhibitors are very anxious to obtain the reel for exhibition at their respective houses. In view of the large attendance at the ball, these pictures will be "right at home" in all neighborhoods. Crandall's theater will next show them in the downtown section.

The decision of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia that the giving of baseball exhibitions on Sunday is illegal brings again before the public the Sunday prohibition of other amusements. The police regulations thus upheld covers all sorts of entertainments, plays, operas, circuses, gymnastics and all games. It is not believed, however, that the regulations will be made to apply to motion picture exhibitions.

C. L. LINZ.

A moving picture show operated by schedule; that's the way Harry Crandall is doing business these days. Mr. Crandall has had a large supply of cards printed with his theater's name and address on the face, and a schedule of the starting of each show, beginning at 11 a. m., on the reverse. The weekday shows occupy an hour and a quarter, while the Sunday shows begin every hour on the hour and run continuously until 11 p. m. It is surprising to know how many calls Mr. Crandall has received for these cards, or how many times each day his employees answer the telephone to inform Mr. or Mrs. So-and-So the time the next show will begin. In addition to attracting widespread attention, this scheme is working out very satisfactorily in the distribution of crowds. In the winter the people do not particularly care about standing around the lobby waiting for admission, nor do they care to enter a theater in the middle of a show. If they know that an exhibition is scheduled to begin at a definite period, they will be "Johnny-on-the-spot." This also tends to prevent a loss of patronage when the house is full through the use of the statement, "The show is nearly over and there will be plenty of seats in....minutes." Although in operation but two weeks, Mr. Crandall states that this new wrinkle is working out very satisfactorily.

Among the visitors in town last week were L. Rosenbluh and L. A. Getzler, of the Greater New York Film Rental Exchange; A. Carlos, general manager of the Box Office Attractions Company, and J. D. Hofheimer, who operates several theaters in Norfolk, Va.

C. L. Worthington, formerly of this city, but now in charge of the Philadelphia office of the Box Office Attractions Company, came to Washington to attend the ball and banquet of the Exhibitors' League, of the District of Columbia. The Baltimoreans who came here for the same purpose were Marian S. Pierce, president of the National Motion Picture Exhibitors' League; J. H. Bennett, of the New Pickwick; Steve Brodie, of Brodie's theater; Frank Durkee, of the Palace theater; Guy Wonders, of the Wilson theater; William Fait, Jr., of Fait's theaters, and Harry Redish, of the Electric theater, who was accompanied by Mrs. Redish.

It is reported that a company to be known as the A. B. C. Amusement Company will soon be incorporated with a capital of $250,000, its purpose being to erect and operate an amusemnt place which it is said will be the finest south of New York, and will, in fact, rival some of the famous Broadway resorts. The building will be erected on Pennsylvania avenue, between Seventeenth and Eighteenth streets, Northwest, with a frontage of ninety feet and a depth of 123 feet, which will make it the largest place of its kind in the city. It is to be known as the Palais de Danse and will include several amusements. The first floor will be devoted to motion pictures; the second floor will be given over to dancing and will be elaborately decorated.

Lieutenant "Jim" P. Anderson, manager of the Washington exchange of the Greater New York Film Rental Company, will also act in a similar capacity for the Box Office Attractions Company. Handling the productions of these two great companies will require additional office room and Mr. Anderson is about to sign a lease that will give to him two floors of a Ninth street building, each floor having a frontage of 25 feet and a depth of 150 feet. This large floor space is to be divided into offices, film, paper and shipping rooms and a projecting room wherein will be shown all big features that the exhibitors may see just what they are getting before placing an order. This will be the second exhibition room of its kind in the city. The furnishings will be very elaborate and the first move will be the laying of a parquetry flooring. This new exchange will be one of the finest equipped in the city, and it will not be long before possession is taken of the property.

CLARENCE L. LINZ.

ST. LOUIS.

W. S. RIDDELL, who is the new manager of the Marguerite Clark theater at Olive and Sarah streets, is making extensive alterations in the theater. Four large boxes, seating ten persons each, are being built on each side of the stage. This takes up considerable space in the front and sacrifices a hundred and fifty seats, but it adds greatly to the appearance of the theater, and as twenty cents will be charged for seats in the boxes, the box office will not suffer to any great extent. A new heating system has also been installed; ten new heaters have been added to the plant, which is a combination of gas and hot water. The seating capacity of the house is now 1,050.

The West End Lyric, which is situated near Delmar and Euclid avenues, more than five miles from downtown, advertises with photographs of players in its current bills mounted in handsome lobby display frames, which are set up in the windows of vacant buildings in the shopping districts.

The beautiful new Kings theater, 800 North Kingshighway, which has been regilded, repainted and thoroughly refurnished for its second season, is doing excellent business with a program consisting of three reels of pictures and vaudeville. M. J. Cunningham, who is managing the theater, is a well-known theatrical man in the west.

Frank L. Talbot, manager of the Hippodrome, on Sixth street, near Market, has resigned, and his place has been taken by David E. Russell. Mr. Talbot is a pioneer in the amusement world. He built the Gem theater, at Sixth and Walnut streets, five years ago, and then followed that by erecting the Hippodrome, the largest seating capacity house in the city. Mr. Talbot is also interested in theaters in Kansas City and throughout the west.

The West End Lyric, at Delmar and Euclid avenues, is absolutely the last word in theaters. The lobby looks like the reception room to an art gallery. Three oriental carpets decorate the mosaic floor, a large Roman vase five feet high stands in the center filled with growing ferns, smaller urns are at the sides and a large willow jardiniere is kept replenished daily with cut flowers. The glass doors of the lobby are draped with cable net curtains with the word "Lyric" woven in the mesh. The house seats eleven hundred, and has played to standing room only every night since its opening, a month ago. Only large features are shown and music is furnished by a five-piece orchestra and a Victrola. The theater is managed by Mrs. J. W. Cornelius, wife of J. W. Cornelius of the Lyric on North Sixth st.

Warner's Feature Exchange is preparing to move from the Benoist Building to an elegant suite of offices at 3628 Olive street. This is in the same building that houses the Box Office Attractions Exchange, and is only fifty or sixty feet from the General Film Company's offices.

The Strand, a new moving picture theater on North Sixth street, was opened on October 25 with a continuous program from ten o'clock in the morning until eleven at night. The new house is next door to the Columbia, the leading vaudeville theater in the city, and is owned and operated by the same management. The Strand is a very handsome theater, with all the late improvements.

Warner's Features has moved its exchange from the second floor of the Benoist Building at Ninth and Pine streets to spacious and well appointed offices at 3628 Olive street. The new offices are on the ground floor, very complete and handsome, and well equipped for the handling of film business.

"Ireland a Nation," the five-reel historical film, is playing an indefinite engagement at the Garrick theater, Sixth and Chestnut streets. The reel, which depcits the history of Ireland in her struggle for independence since 1808, is taking very favorably. The press is giving it unusual notice, and the Ancient Order of Hibernians and the Knights of Columbus have attended the play in crowds. H. P. Toohey, who is managing the film, is giving it an elaborate production with appropriate Irish music and songs. Four performances are given daily, and twenty-five and fifty cents admission is charged.

The West End Lyric theater, Delmar and Euclid avenues, uses an automobile for advertising purposes to good advantage. The tonneau and all of the machine behind the driver is boxed in with a frame five feet high, which is covered with thin muslin, and the advertising matter, which takes the form of the day's program, is painted on the cloth. A light on the inside of this frame makes it into a huge transparency for night use.

A moving picture entertainment was given to two hundred insane patients in the City Sanitarium on the night of October 27. The patients enjoyed the pictures to the utmost.

The Victoria theater, on Delmar near Grand avenue, gives a program of feature films every night of the week, except Sunday, when a German stock company entertains its patrons with native plays.

A new theater is being planned for Delmar avenue, near Hamilton, which will seat fifteen hundred patrons. The new house will front on Delmar avenue, and entrance to it will be gained through a twenty-two foot lobby, flanked on each side of two storerooms. The new house is near the Park theater, which recently went over to musical and dramatic stock performances, and hence there is a well defined demand for an all picture house in the neighborhood.

Moving pictures will be used as an aid in finishing the free municipal bridge that the city of St. Louis has been trying to build for the last five years. A moving picture rally will be held in a hundred and forty picture theaters on the eve of the special election that will be held for the purpose of voting the bonds necessary to complete the bridge. The event has been advertised by slides showing a cartoon by "Fitz," the Post Dispatch artist, containing a reproduction of the "It is up to you" cartoon, which shows the mailed figure of St. Louis pointing to the unfinished bridge.

The large church on Grand and Washington avenues, which is being converted into a moving picture theater, is about ready for its initial bill. The structure of the church lent itself readily to the needs of a theater. The audience chamber of the building is a long oval, the screen, instead of being placed at the end of this space, will be at the west side of the building. This will prevent all the space being used for seats, because the audience would get an oblique view of the screen if seated at either end of the oval, but the space not utilized will be made into generous aisles and will give the auditorium a large appearance. The high ceilings, as well as the beautiful stained glass windows, will not be disturbed. The front of the building is being altered by the addition of storerooms on each side of the steps that lead to the lobby. W. W. Busby is owner of the theater, which has been named the Duchess, and C. H. Tabler will be active manager. A crowd of seven hundred and fifty can be taken care of, and the show, which will be five reels, will be continuous from 12 noon until 11 p. m. GIEBLER.

MISS AGNES L. DWIGHT, chief librarian of the city library at Appleton, speaks from several years' experience of the moving picture as a factor in reading. "There is no question in my mind but that the moving pictures have a decided influence on the number of books taken from the library," she says, "tending to greatly reduce the number of books on good fiction. While there is an increase of books called for each year on account of the city's growth there would be a great many more read if it were not for the pictures. Of course some of the moving pictures which are adapted from books stimulate a desire for those books, but this does not offset the number of readers weaned away on account of the moving pictures. Time is the great factor. It is much easier to sit through a moving picture of a great work than to spend hours over the book."

He also said: "All drama in history originated in religion. This thing that has been spit upon and decried as vicious issued from the holy mother's bosom. It is one of the greatest educational influences. Every person entering a theater receives an impression and comes forth somewhat better or worse for that impression. We support public libraries by the taxation of people. But do the libraries give what the people want? If they did there would be more of Laura Jean Libbey and less of Shakespeare on the library shelves. No, indeed, we give them what they should have and in this way teach them to want something better. The theater should proceed in the same way." He called the attitude of this country to its theaters barbaric, but is happy because the United States is losing its old illogical and foolish prejudice against the theaters.

STINK bombs, missiles from slingshots and posters or stickers containing what are thought by attorneys to be libelous statements were some of the methods used by striking moving picture operators in New Orleans, La., in their fight against the Pearce and Fichtenberg theaters in that city. Four men who were caught by detectives, it is stated, in the act of pasting bills attacking the theaters are said to have given their occupations as operators. The men gave the names of James O. Webb, age 20 years; Fred Chateau, 18 years; Albert S. Johnston, 18 years, and Louis A. Chateau, 23 years. The detectives saw the men enter the vestibule of Pearce's Dreamland and remain there about three minutes. After they were placed under arrest forty stickers urging people not to patronize the houses were found on the glass doors and windows. One of the men had 26 stickers and clippings referring to the strike in his pockets; another had 22 stickers and a slingshot. They were held on charges of being suspicious characters and malicious mischief. Prior to this, stink bombs had been used in some of the houses and missiles were hurled into the door of Dreamland with a "nigger-shotter."

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

KENTUCKY.

FINE weather for the past two or three weeks in Louisville has held attendances up nicely, and the local exhibitors are well pleased with fall business this season. Good two and three-reel productions are in brisk demand by exhibitors just now, although serials have in most cases drawn good crowds. Sunday night crowds have packed all of the houses in the downtown section and capacity business is the rule. Several new houses are nearing completion or have already been opened, and a number are in the air just now. The film exchanges are all busy.

The S. & P. Film Supply Company, of Louisville, has filed amended articles of incorporation in which it lists its capital stock at $15,000. The concern was capitalized a few months ago for $1,500, and its growth has been phenomenal. Fred Sheldon, manager of the concern, has been in the business for a number of years and is thoroughly acquainted with the various details. Charles Pressy, his partner for years, has had charge of concessions at parks and other places, and both men are well fitted for the business. The concern has been short on films practically ever since first opening for business and is buying all the good material to be had.

J. J. Hebert, local manager for the Warner Feature Company, has just returned from a trip to Elkton, Bowling Green and Russellville, Ky. He took on the new Princess theater, of the Crescent Amusement Company, at Bowling Green. Mrs. Hebert has been assisting him in his work and running the office while he is out in the state.

Business with the Crystal theater on Market near Third, Louisville, has been fairly good of late. The recent destruction of Hopkins theater by fire has helped nearly all of the Market street theaters to some extent. The Crystal, while it is only twenty-five feet wide, is deep and has a seating capacity of 330. The pictures are projected from a balcony at the rear of the house as the "throw" would be impossible otherwise.

Simon Switow, of the Switow Amusement Company, Louisville, returned recently from a trip to Madisonville, Ky., where he spent several days. He has been rather busy for some weeks past calling on houses at a distance from Louisville.

Arthur V. Scheckler, formerly connected with the Louisville Warner office, is doing nicely with the Alice theater of Vincennes, Ind., which was originally named after the famous character, "Alice of Old Vincennes." "The Perils of Pauline" and the "Million Dollar Mystery" have been shown very successfully recently. C. E. Hampson, proprietor of the theater, left Louisville last week on a trip to Vincennes.

M. Switow, president of the Fourth Avenue Amusement Company, Louisville, which is completing the Alamo theater, is spending a great deal of time at the new building, which is coming along in fine shape.

The new Kentucky Gold Fish Farms, which were recently established on Green street between Fourth and Fifth, Louisville, have completed their tanks and other equipment and a stock of gold fish is now on hand. Fish are sold at wholesale and retail, not only to picture show houses but to any buyers.

Charles Pressy, of the S. & P. Film Supply Company, Louisville, has returned from a trip to Macon, Atlanta, and other southern points. Fred Sheldon recently made a special trip to Chicago in search of additional film.

Miss Agnes F. Mueller, of New Albany, Ind., has been added to the office force of the Owl Feature Film Company.

The building inspector's office of Louisville has been very careful this fall in its inspections of theaters and moving picture houses. At the beginning of the season at the legitimate play houses all scenery had to stand a lighted match test at the edges of a hole bored in the scenery for the purpose.

Ten of the leading motion picture houses of Louisville recently took part in a co-operative advertisement which was rather unique. In every advertisement there was one word which had a letter missing. These letters proeprly put together formed a hyphenated word. Prizes of 110 free tickets to the motion picture houses in the advertisements were offered to the persons who put the word together in the neatest form and got their answers in early. The first prize was two free tickets to each of the ten theaters, the second two tickets to five theaters and so on down the line. Theaters taking part in the proposition were the Mary Anderson, Majestic, Novelty, Columbia, Olympic, Cherokee, Crystal, Alamo, Hippodrome and the Broadway Amusement Company, which advertised six theaters.

The Scenic theater at Ironton, Ky., was recently sold to Mr. Relkin, of Hartford, Conn., who will conduct the theater hereafter himself. He expects to introduce a few new novelties into the game, he has stated.

J. M. Waugh, of Grayson, Ky., is reported to have purchased a moving picture outfit from Jet Bagby and will operate a show.

The Auditorium theater, a legitimate show house of Russellville, Ky., is not operating this season, as moving picture shows have killed cheap stage productions in the town. The same thing may be said of a number of the smaller opera houses throughout the state, now occupied by moving picture concerns which are far better money makers.

Col. Charles Ryan, of Russellville, Ky., who was recently reported to be on the verge of opening a picture show at Russellville, Ky., changed his mind and will drop the proposition for the present at least.

J. G. Kinner, manager of the Empire theater, of Hazard, Ky., reports that the Empire Amusement Company, which also operates a theater in Whitesburg, Ky., has been incorporated for $5,000 to handle the two show houses. Stock to the amount of $2,700 has been reserved by the management and the balance will be sold. Development is coming rapidly in this part of the mountain section of Kentucky, and the two houses are expected to be big dividend producers for years to come. The company is willing to sell stock to a good practical man who would take a working interest in the business. G. D. CRAIN, JR.

The carnival has attracted great crowds to the Fillmore street district this week and the moving picture houses have done a heavy business.

The new theater to be opened shortly at South San Francisco is to be known as The Royal.

Extensive preparations are being made at the local offices of the Thanhouser Syndicate Corporation for the early release of the new serial, "Zudora," and heavy bookings are now being made. Fred S. Peachy, well known on the Coast, has been placed in charge of the Thanhouser business at Los Angeles.

The Bay View theater has been opened under the management of Wethered & Connors.

George Breck has transformed his supply house on Turk street into an art gallery for the time being, and has on display some splendid photographs and paintings of screen favorites. Chief of these is an oil painting of Mary Pickford, that is arousing much favorable comment.

The store that has been secured is 37 feet by 137½ feet in size, with a large basement. An exhibition room is to be fitted up in the basement and this will be available for the use of anyone wishing to display their films.

Edward H. Kemp, Commercial Building, won first prize at the Exposition of the Retailers' Protective Association held last week at the Coliseum, the award being for the most attractive display. A Motiograph machine was on display and a Phantoscope was in continuous operation. Branch offices will be established shortly at Los Angeles, Seattle and Denver by C. L. Williams, who has charge of this territory. A feature of the local offices will be an exhibition room, which is now under construction and which will be complete in every detail. This room has been lined throughout with steel, making it absolutely fireproof, and all of the storage rooms where films are to be kept will also be steel lined. Mr. Williams plans to make a trip over the entire territory to establish sub-offices as soon as the San Francisco branch is in running order.

A private showing of the George Kleine Attraction masterpiece, "Julius Caesar," was given last week in the exhibiting room of the General Film Company by Tom North. Langley, of the Turner & Dahnken circuit; M. Marx, of the Columbia theater; J. Huff, of the Odeon theater; Sam Levin and Sam Gordon, of Levin & Gordon; Mr. Getz, of the Market street theater; Robert Abrams, of Kahn & Greenfield; Ralph Pincus, J. McArthur and G. B. Plans are progressing very favorably for the ball to be held at the Coliseum on November 28th, under the auspices of the Screen Club of San Francisco, and the indications are that this will be one of the greatest affairs of the kind ever held on the Coast. Assurances have been given that there will be a great attendance of actor folks from the studios of California and a special train will bring a large party from Los Angeles. Headquarters for the visitors will be established at the St. Francis Hotel.

The Nat A. Magner Company has received some of the first subjects to be released under the Alliance Program, and is meeting with great success in booking the service.

The Portola theater has been crowded during the entire week, the attraction being Alco's "Salomy Jane," which was given its premier presentation. The picture was made in the redwoods near San Francisco, and the stage coach and other equipment used were real relics of early Western days. The Portola theater was handsomely decorated during the week with evergreens and the old-time stage coach driven through the streets of the city attracted widespread attention. Attractive postcards were presented to patrons of the theater as souvenirs.

The Markee theater, the beautiful new house of H. C. Schmidt, at Palo Alto, was formally opened on October 26, in the presence of a large crowd. LICENSED FILM STORIES

LUBIN.

THE BELOVED ADVENTURER NO. 10—LORD CECIL KEEPS HIS WORD (Nov. 16).—Upon learning that the mine which he purchased from the swindler, Carson, is really very valuable, Lord Cecil hurries from the United States back to England in order to save his ancient estate from sale under mortgage foreclosures and arrives just in time to do so. He found no opportunity to say good-bye to Betty, the little western girl, who, first assisting in swindling him, later saved his fortune from her self-appointed guardian, Carson. As Lord Cecil is now a millionaire, however, he intends to return and tell Betty of his love. Carson, taking Betty with him, follows Lord Cecil to England, determined to regain possession of the mine. He informs Lord Cecil that as he, Carson, had no legal right to sell the property the former has no good title—that the mine belongs to Elizabeth Lee, an orphan, and that if Cecil is an honest gentleman he will give it up to her, Carson undertaking to refund the $25,000 paid by Cecil. This Cecil agrees to.

Lord Cecil meets Betty and she learns of his love, and that the thought of the poverty he must now face, when he has given up the mine keeps him silent. The girl's love is great enough for her to tell him that she wishes him to marry her at once and his heart overcomes his judgment—they are married at once over the Scottish border. Betty asks him to keep the marriage a secret for a little time. Lord Cecil receives the $25,000 from Carson and gives him an order on his bankers, directing them to deliver to Elizabeth Lee the stock of the Golden Hope mine. Carson has expected that the stock would be delivered to him, and is furious, but helpless. The next day there is a meeting of Lord Cecil's creditors, and to Cecil's amazement the banker informs them that Lord Cecil has kept his word, given them long before, that he would marry an American heiress and that they may draw on the bank for all claims. The banker then conducts Cecil into another room, where they find Betty, and Cecil learns that her name is not, as he thought, Betty Carson, but Elizabeth Lee, and that he has indeed married an American heiress. Scotland Yard informs Carson that his presence in England is undesirable, and he hastens to leave forever. Lord and Lady Cecil go to spend their honeymoon at ancient Croftleigh Manor, and enter their future home amid the cheers of the assembled tenantry. Henceforth the life of the Beloved Adventurer is to be one of prosperity and happiness.

SHE WAS THE OTHER (Nov. 17).—The chief of the Riverside police is despairing of making his men neat and orderly. He reads in a newspaper that a brother chief has solved his problem by appointing a woman inspector, and the chief posts a notice that on the following Monday his sister will become inspector. The chief has two sisters, Helen, a stunning woman, and Cutie, who is older than she wants to be. The men all know Cutie, for the cops are the only men that will talk to her, and they even go to the point of making fake arrests to escape her wiles. They know nothing of Helen and they hold an indignation meeting and declare that they will make business brisk for Cutie when she gets on the job. Cutie, too, thinks she is slated for the job until the chief breaks it to her gently that she is not. Monday comes and the cops turn up in the most disreputable shape and they smile clear to the back of their necks when Cutie prances in, but their glee turns to dismay when Helen breezes in and they realize what a sight they are. They hustle out through the doors and windows, and presently return all spruced up. The chief congratulates himself that his troubles are at an end.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION (Nov. 17).—Emil Schultz, stranded in a small hamlet, receives a telegram from a motion picture company in Florida, offering him a position providing he pays his own transportation, but Emil has not the necessary currency to buy a doughnut. Strolling out into a field, where a farmer is dynamiting, Emil sits on a stump and gets blown high in the air. Landing in the water, he is picked up by a dredge mud bucket and dumped on a scow. The foreman of the dredge discovers Emil and kicks him back into the river. He is then picked up by the anchor of a big ship bound for Florida. The mate finds him and puts him to work scrubbing the deck.

But at this his artistic nature revolts. Sneaking down into the hold of the ship he breaks open a box and crawls in. The ship carpenter nails up the box and Emil is closed inside. The ship arrives at Jacksonville, the box, with Emil still inside, is dumped on the wharf. The following day an expressman carts it away and proceeds to rush it to its destination. He is pursued by a bicycle cop, but refuses to stop. Emil, inside the box, receives the benefit of the bullets from the pursuing cop's revolver. The driver eludes the cop, but in so doing drops the box on a railroad track and drives on, not noticing the loss. A fast freight comes along, hits the box and sends it hurtling in the air; it splinters to pieces and Emil falls out in front of a racing automobile, but is picked up by the bumpers and carried off at a mile a minute. He is then pushed off and falls under the car. After being dragged for a mile, the car is stopped and he is pulled under the rear and kicked off, but he is happy when he finds he is in front of the picture studio. Dashing inside, he runs up to the director, shows his telegram, only to learn the position has just been filled. Emil faints and is picked up and dumped into the river. Undaunted, he starts swimming back to New York.

THE MARRIAGE WAGER (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 18).—Jacques and Pierre Roques, brothers, are sworn enemies owing to a bitter quarrel over the distribution of the family will. Pierre, fearing death at the hands of Jacques, flees to America and settles in a lonely mansion with his daughter, Beth. His wealth is secreted in the cellar and guarded by a huge automatic port-cullis arrangement. Henry Leeds, a wild young bachelor utterly opposed to marriage, is bantered unmercifully by fellow-clubmen until he signs an agreement to get married within twenty-four hours. Next morning he awakens, sober, and realizes what he had done the night before. Hurriedly he summons his chauffeur and starts for a ride in the country.

At the same hour, Jacques has located the mansion of his brother. He enters it secretly, determined to secure what he considers his share to the wealth. Pierre's faithful old butler attempts to stop Jacques. The latter stuns him, ties him to a chair and proceeds on his way to the cellar. He had previously imprisoned Beth in her bed room. Henry, passing in his car, receives a note from Beth calling for help. He picks up the note, which has been placed in a slipper and thrown into his auto, and hurries to her assistance. He enters the house, releases her and then turns his attention to reviving the badly wounded butler. Beth, fearing for her father's safety rushes down into the narrow stone passageway to the treasure chamber. She finds Pierre and Jacques in fearful combat. When she tries to interfere Jacques flings her into the treasure vault and locks the heavy iron door.

The two brothers struggle on. Pierre is overcome by Jacques, who plans to carry out fiendish revenge. He ties Pierre securely under the death-dealing port-cullis and presses a button which starts the heavy iron bars to descend slowly towards the helpless victim. Henry, fearing for Beth's safety, has descended into the passageway in time to be intercepted by the crazed Jacques. Henry realizes he must reach Pierre in a few seconds if his life is to be saved. While Beth is slowly suffocating in the vault and while the port-cullis slowly descends upon Pierre, Henry and Jacques fight desperately. Henry kills him and reaches Pierre just in time to rescue him. He liberates Beth from the vault and hastens to revive father and daughter. With the realization that he has gained Beth's gratitude he remembers his wager, proposes to her and soon telephones the club that he has won.

ON SUSPICION (Special Two Parts—Nov. 19).—Maud Grey has a heated argument with John Maddox, the prosecuting attorney, who is her fiance, over a third degree account in the newspaper. Maddox arrogantly defends the system and he and Maud part in a huff. The next morning Maud receives a letter from a wayward brother, asking her to come to Havenhurst, a nearby seaside resort. Telling her father that she intends to spend the night with a girl friend, Maud leaves the city. On the morning Maud is to reach Havenhurst, the hotel management receives a warning that Meg Slade and Speed Coyne, notorious hotel thieves, are operating in the territory. The warning is handed to the house detective.

He meets the train on which Maud arrives and spots her for Meg Slade. Meanwhile, Speed Coyne has gone to work at the hotel and planned his loot in a pearl necklace, the property of a wealthy matron at the hotel. Meg Slade arrives by motor car as an ultra-fashionable lady, and is met by Speed in his capacity of bellhop. Meg makes the acquaintance of the matron and provides an opportunity to weaken the clasp of the necklace. That night while Meg entertains the matron, who through the breaking of the clasp has been forced to leave the necklace in her suite, Speed creeps down the fire escape from Meg's apartment and secures it.

During the day, Maud has met her brother and given him money. He leaves, swings a freight train, and starts back to the city. Maud, shadowed by the hotel detective, returns to the hotel. In the morning she leaves early. Following her departure, the robbed matron announces her loss. The detective hurried to the depot too late to head off Maud. Meg calmly walks out of the hotel with the necklace in her luggage, and dashes away from the hotel in her auto driven by Speed. The hotel detective telephones to the city police and the chief issues an order for the arrest of Maud and her brother. Both are apprehended and brought to headquarters and put through the third degree. When confronted with her brother Maud faints and is carried to cell. In the throes of hysterics, she answers "yes" to every question put to her. This constitutes a "confession" upon which the chief secures a complaint from Maddox. In the meantime Meg and Speed have been arrested for speeding and brought to Maddox's office. While his fiance has been undergoing the third degree, the prosecutor has been talking to the real crooks and lets them go as he issues a complaint for his betrothed. Maud is arraigned in court. All indications point to her guilt. The house detective has arrived and identifies her. Her confession is before the judge. He is about to hold her when Maddox enters court to handle the arraignment. He recognizes Maud and rescues her. In Maddox's office, Maud recovers her composure. As her eyes glance about, they discover the newspaper and the article over which she and her fiance had the controversy. She points to it. Maddox hangs his head and admits he has learned a lesson.

THE UNKNOWN COUNTRY (Nov. 20).—Robert Strong and Edgar Marsh are fellow-medical students and friends. They have delved deeply into the occult, and Marsh has developed hypnotic powers to a high degree. The particular object toward which they are working is to determine the exact relation of completely suspended animation to death. Both fall in love with Alice Gray, who in time becomes engaged to Robert. He abandons the researches hitherto carried forward with Marsh. Marsh conceals his hatred for Strong, pretending a warm friendship. Just before the time set for the marriage of Robert to Alice, Marsh arrives at startling conclusions as the result of his researches, and induces Robert to assist in a demonstration.

Without informing him of the exact nature of the experiment, Marsh, hypnotizing first Robert and then himself, brings about a total suspension of animation in both bodies, setting free the inner natures or souls. That of Marsh, a hideous thing, quickly enters the body of Robert, but that of Robert, with understanding and vision unclouded by the flesh, will not enter the form of Marsh. Marsh, clothed in Robert's body, proposes to take Robert's place as the lover and future husband of Alice, but the girl's spiritual love cannot be deceived, though her physical senses are, and she breaks her engagement at the last moment, though why she suddenly recoils in horror from her lover she cannot explain even to herself. Defeated, Marsh, in Robert's body, returns to the place where his own body still lies inanimate, and sets himself free from his borrowed case. Robert's soul immediately repossesses itself of his own form and he flees from the accursed place.

Marsh's spirit undertakes to re-enter his own body, but cannot do so—the body has remained untenanted by a soul for too long, and has passed from the state of suspended animation to that of true death. The same instinct which warned her against Marsh in the form of her lover tells Alice that all is well when Robert comes to her, and for them there is the promise of a future of happiness.

THE TALE OF A COAT (Nov. 21).—Tony, a tailor's apprentice, is in love with Lena Houf, who is cashier in the same establishment. Lena writes a very loving little note to Tony and when a customer enters with a coat to be pressed in a hurry, Lena tries to smuggle the note into the work room to Tony by hiding it in the pocket of the customer's coat. Tony fails to secure the note and the customer walks out calmly unconscious of the loving missive he is carrying off.

Ralph Barton, the customer, also has a sweetheart, and when she accidentally finds Lena's note she will listen to no explanation. While Ralph is trying to square himself, a crook steals the coat and disposes of it to a second-hand dealer. Mr. and Mrs. Hay, from the country, pass the shop and buy the coat. Mrs. Hay finds the note and another row ensues. When the row is at its height, Barton appears and calls an officer. The whole affair is explained at the police station and four aching hearts are soothed.

THE DADDY OF THEM ALL (Nov. 21).—The County Welfare Society to encourage larger families offer prizes of ten dollars to every man who is father of ten or more children and a grand prize of a thousand dollars to the highest. Peters is a little runt, but with twenty-three children to his string, he thinks he has a chance to win the thousand. He makes a run for the committee room, because he has less than an hour to spare. He finds the judges admiring a group of big fellows and when he puts in his claim they give him the laugh because he is so small. They say, "You'll have to show us; produce the twenty-three children." Then he dashes home, and back again with Mrs. Peters and the children. He arrives at the hall with only a minute to spare, and Peters is the lion of the occasion. He takes the thousand, but only for a minute, for Mrs. Peters quickly relieves him of all responsibility on that score. He has quite a problem on his hands when the round up shows a count of thirty-three instead of twenty-three. Mrs. Peters happily relieves the tension on that point also.

THE BELOVED ADVENTURER NO. 11—THE SERPENT COMES TO EDEN (Nov. 23).—Lord and Lady Cecil have begun an idyllic life at Croftlaigh. In Betty's sky is a tiny cloud. It seems strange to her that Cecil should desire no intercourse with the world of rank and fashion to which he had been used, and gradually there grows upon her the tormenting thought that he may be ashamed to present her as his wife. Monte Carson, the gambler, who had, for his own profit, assumed the position of foster-father to Betty when she was a child, and whose attempt to recover from Lord Cecil the "Golden Hope" mine had resulted in establishing Betty as the true owner, secretly returns to England, determined that he will in some way revenge himself on Lord Cecil and the girl, and secure control of her fortune. He gets in touch with the Countess Lurovich, an adventuress, whose schemes have twice been upset by Lord Cecil, and who welcomes an opportunity to harm him. A clever plot is formed, whereby Betty is made to think not only that Cecil is ashamed of her, but that he is in love with the Countess, an actor closely resembling Cecil being used to impersonate him in scenes with the Countess which it is arranged Betty shall witness.

At the proper moment Carson appears and convinces Betty that she has misjudged him—that he is and always has been her true friend. He readily induces the heartbroken girl to flee with him from what is, as she thinks, a shameful and intolerable situation. She goes, leaving no trace or clue to her intentions, and Cecil is utterly crushed by this calamity. Betty is utterly indifferent to her fate, so long as she can get away from the scene of her humiliation and avoid ever again seeing Cecil, and allows the triumphant Carson, who thinks that he will soon be able to acquire from her control of the "Golden Hope," to take her where he will. Carson has not yet discovered that Betty's last act before leaving Croftlaigh had been to prove the unselfishness of her love for Cecil by making and leaving for him a deed of gift for the mine.

MOTHER'S BABY BOY (Nov. 24).—It must be admitted that Percival Pilkins is not an ideal hero, in fact he is quite the reverse. He is mother's petted, pampered darling. Bill Green and Tom Brown are a pair of rude fellows who rather resent the fact that Percy interrupts their wooing of Nell Haldane, and they run Percy clear back to his boarding house. Percy writes to his mother that he just knows his vacation is going to be spoiled by these uncouth boys and mother promptly telegraphs that she is coming along to protect him. Percy shows the wire to Bill and Tom as a dreadful warning, but they don't seem to care. Instead they lay in wait for him again, but Nell sees the hold-up and flies to Percy's rescue. She is a little late, because he gets home before she can catch him and there is his mother on the porch. Mother isn't a little bit husky; she is a tiny little woman and Tom is rude enough to soak Percy one right under his mother's nose. Poor Tom didn't know that mother had brought along a prizefighter to act as Percy's bodyguard, but she did, and Tom and Bill are tossed into the river. Unfortunately Percy also falls in and takes mother along with him, which is not as things should be.

HE WANTED CHICKENS (Nov. 24).—Tom Renson is a chicken fancier. He sends for some prize winners. He has won the enmity of Ben Boggs because Ben thinks he is trying to steal his girl from him, though this is the last thing Tom would think of. Ben writes an anonymous letter to Tess, Tom's wife, and accuses Tom of being a "chicken stealer," telling the sort of "chickens" he means, and Tom has to do some tall explaining. Tom gets word that the chickens will be in on the afternoon train and goes to get them. He drops the letter and Tess gets it. She goes to the train, too. As luck would have it, there is a burlesque show, "all girls" on the train, and Tess thinks those are the expected chickens. Even after Tom fully explains she still has her suspicions.

THE MAKING OF HIM (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 25).—Donald Atwater, lazy, blaze society man, finds his affection reciprocated by Alicia Demarest, one of the season's debutantes. At the naval Training Station, in Newport, Donald introduces Alicia to Lieutenant Ardling and Ensign Herford. In contrasting her society sweetheart with the energetic, ambitious naval officers Alicia realizes that Donald is simply wasting his opportunities and wrecking his future. In order to rouse his spirit she openly shows a preference for the naval men, and the game culminates at a battleship dance to which Donald has not been invited. Jealousy prompts Donald to go uninvited. He quarrels with Alicia and is virtually thrown off the ship by her escorts. The quarrel is continued later in the evening, when, upon arriving home, she finds Donald awaiting her. Donald is given the preference of going through four hard months of naval training or of never seeing her again. He accepts the former.

While Donald is making a man of himself the naval officers dance attendance on Alicia at society functions. They even go to the Naval Training Station exhibition, where they see Donald go through the naval maneuvers and sham battles. Donald sees them and vows to get even. He does. On the day he is released from training Ardling and Herford fight for Alicia's hand. She slips away to meet Donald and plight anew a troth emphasized by the acceptance of Donald as a member of his father's working force. The officers witness the little love scene, realize they have been duped and return to their ship sadder but wiser.

WAS HIS DECISION RIGHT? (Special—Two Parts Nov. 26). Nance Alcott, driven by poverty, has become a "scarlet woman." A wealthy relative, dying, leaves a will stipulating that if Nance will remain unmarried and will care for a helplessly paralyzed girl a large fortune will be hers. Nance grasps the chance to lead an honest life and finds peace and happiness tending to the wants of the gentle cripple, Lily.

An elderly clergyman, who works to better the social evil, has charge of his sister's boy, who is rather incorrigible. The clergyman is downcast when he fails at reforming the young man. Jason, the nephew, motors to a country inn with some gay companions and after leaving them saves the crippled girl from impending death at the risk of his own life. He receives the gratitude of Nance and their friendship develops into love. The clergyman notices the change in the boy's life and character and learns that it is a woman who has caused the reformation. The older man goes with Jason to meet the woman the boy wishes to marry, and is horrified to recognize Nance as a once "scarlet woman." She pleads with him not to tell the boy, as she realizes that it is the belief in her purity that is keeping him straight, but the minister believes it is his duty to warn Jason. Nance begs for three days in which to prepare to take Lily and go away so that she need never come across Jason, and the minister agrees to keep silent until she has gone. Before the three days are up, however, Jason proposes and Nance, struggling against love, has to refuse. Lily hears the refusal and believes that Nance denies love because of the stipulation of the will. The clergyman is amazed to receive a note urgently requesting him to come to Nance. He goes and learns that Lily, worshiping her caretaker, has killed herself that love may have full sway. The old man's heart is touched and his struggle with conscience begins. Can he do less for love than that poor child has done? Can he make her death of no avail by tearing the lovers apart? He decides that he cannot and, though doubts assail him, he keeps silent and gives his consent to the marriage of Nance and Jason.

HE WAITS FOREVER (Nov. 27).—Jose Suarez, a poor Mexican, loves Helena Moreno, daughter of Felipe Moreno, a wealthy resident. Helena returns Jose's affection, but her father forbids her to have anything to do with a poor man. Jose determines to go away, make his fortune and return to claim Helena. He climbs the wall of the Moreno grounds and meets Helena to say good-by. The girl promises to wait for him. The father sees the lovers' meeting, has Jose arrested for trespass and the "jefe politico" orders him out of the town. Jose goes into the Sierras, where he drives a mine shaft. Moreno urges Helena to marry Andres de Romer. The girl declares flatly that she will marry no one but Jose.

Three years pass, and Jose is doggedly driving his mine shaft, but without result. Helena still holds to her troth with Jose. Three more years elapse. Helena, who has gradually learned to forget Jose and love Andres, finally gives in and they are married. About the same time Jose strikes rich ore. He is rapidly becoming wealthy, when he receives a letter from one of the insurrecto commanders offering him a generalship if he will arm his miners and devote some of his gold to the cause of Mexico's freedom. Jose accepts the offer of the insurrecto leader, thinking that he will add fame to his wealth. Jose's army wins many victories and takes possession of his home town. Jose then hurries to Moreno's residence and tells the old man that he has come to claim Helena. Moreno tells him that Helena is married, and points out the happy husband and wife in the garden. Jose is stunned. He returns to his headquarters and there determines upon punishment for all concerned. He sends out a command to townspeople, including Moreno, Helena and Andres, that they are to attend a fiesta which he will give at the inn. Fearing to displease the rebel general all accept the invitation. Jose has a table set with four glasses and a bottle of wine. Before the guests arrive Jose fills the glasses and into each pours several drops of powerful poison. His plan is that Helena, Andres, and Moreno and himself shall drink a toast and die together. Jose greets Helena and Andres as if nothing had happened, but his emotions are so acute that he is seized with a fainting spell. One of the aids calls a waiter and urges him to get a glass of wine. The waiter sees the four glasses already filled on the table. He seizes one and hurries to the side room. Jose returns to the main room and takes Helena, Andres and Moreno to the table to drink the death toast. The poison seizes Jose before they drink and in his agony he grips the table cloth, upsetting the other glasses, and falls forward dead.

YOU CAN'T BEAT THEM (Nov. 28).—Ray Boggs sees a most enticing bargain advertisement in the paper and asks her husband for some money. He is not feeling very amiable and gives his wife only a two-dollar bill. When Ray carries her protest to the front steps he even takes the two-spot back. Of course she telephones to her mother, and mother comes right over and quickly concocts a scheme to play on Ben's jealousy.

They write an anonymous letter, telling him his wife keeps another man's glove in her bureau. Ben gets the letter at his office just as he is signing an important contract, but he throws the contract in the other man's face and rushes home. After a vivid rough house he finds the glove a boxing glove and mother calmly admits that she wrote the letter to trap him. She suggests that it will make a fine story for the boys at the club. Of course Ben gives Ray half his roll to buy her off, and he has an increased respect for his mother-in-law's diplomacy.

THE SERVANT GIRL'S LEGACY (Nov. 28).—Mandy Spragg is a domestic slave, otherwise a servant girl. She spurns the poor, but Cy Whitfield, her fellow-laborer, loves her. The family go off for an auto ride and return to find Mandy in the best chair on the front porch. But indignation fades when she shows them a letter, declaring her to be the sole heiress of her uncle's money. Just what the legacy is they do not know, but legacy suggests a lot of money, and the head of the house not only lends her money to go shopping with but sends her down in the family auto. Done up in a good copy of a fashionable woman, Mandy does not show up so badly, and even the boys, who are courting the daughters of the house, turn traitor and sue for Mandy's hand and fortune. She will have none of that. Poor Cy is in the cold. Then comes a telegram from the lawyer. The total of the fortune is $25. Mandy's new friends vanish and she is put into her old clothes again and set to beating the rug. The operator explains that he had made a mistake in copying and it should be $225,000. Meantime Cy has proposed, been accepted and Mandy holds fast to him.

BIOGRAPH.

A BETTER UNDERSTANDING (Nov. 9).—The pretty daughter of the country boarding house keeper marries the young composer from the city. Their married life is apparently the happier for his success; but soon he becomes infatuated with his accompanist, and the discovery breaks his wife's heart. She decides to leave him for his own sake.

THE NEW MAGDALEN (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 10).—Left alone in the world, Mercy Merrick toils for a living. Faint with hunger, she falls one evening at the door of a restaurant and is revived by a glass of wine, given her by one of the diners, who has seen her fall. Her bodily weakness makes her an easy prey to the man, and she takes the first reluctant step on the downward path. Some time later, again forced by circumstances to earn her living, she is arrested for shoplifting and, although innocent, sentenced to prison. From the prison she is taken to the House of Refuge, and later, with the help of the matron, she obtains a position in the household of a wealthy woman. But her story quickly becomes known to the other servants, and she is forced to leave. Again at the refuge she becomes a nurse, and in the course of time one of the visiting doctors falls in love with her. But she will not marry him until he knows her record, and when he learns the truth he shrinks from her. To the church goes Mercy for consolation, and falls under the spell of the powerful sermons preached by the Rev. Julian Grey. After much suffering, she determines to leave England and goes out as a Red Cross nurse. It is while thus engaged that she yields to temptation and impersonates a woman whom she thinks dead, so that she may have a new chance in life.

THE FLEUR-DE-LIS RING (Nov. 12).—The young peasant and his sweetheart are happy in her father's approval of their love. The landlord's friend sees the girl alone in the fields and seizes her, his fleur-de-lis ring inflicting a bruise on her arm. The father and the lover have seen his action, and, rushing up, treat him as he deserves. But the landlord comes on the scene and beats them off with his whip. Both vow vengeance for this treatment, and are overheard by a dwarf. That night, each man prepares his weapon and sallies forth. Later, the landlord is found dead, and on the hunchback's accusation the two peasants are arrested. Then circumstance piles on circumstance.

LIFE'S STREAM (Nov. 13).—The understanding sympathy of every woman who ever loved will go out to the mountain girl, the current of whose life was so magically changed after her encounter with a man such as she may have dreamed about in the long stillness of the woodland afternoons. And every man who knows what it is to conquer himself will remember this picture for a long time.

HIS WIFE'S PET (Nov. 14).—"Love me, love my cat" is the ultimatum delivered to Jones by his wife; so he leaves the house scheming to get rid of the animal. Meeting two friends of his wife, he gets them to take her to the picture show, and returns to the house with nineteen cents' worth of chloroform. He puts the cat in a bag. The fumes of the chloroform overcome him. Two burglars enter the house and pack the silver in a bag. The sight of in ticket selling were good enough for their time and day but the need of this rapid age puts past performances in the discard.

At one time we got along without typewriters and Montgomery Ward & Co. wrote all their letters in longhand, but they have changed their methods since that time.

It is only a short time ago that we did not have telephones, but there is no business today that could exist without the above-mentioned labor-saving devices. They make accuracy and save money.

That is what the Security Ticket Seller does. Just compare the old method of tearing off tickets by hand, throwing them out of the window, the wind blowing them hither and thither, with the new method of delivering tickets upright without the use of hands, leaving hands free for the handling of money, and you will readily see that our method is the only way.

Jones asleep in his chair scares them, and when they leave they take the wrong bag. Jones, recovering, leaves the house with the other bag.

THE DEADLY DESPATCH (Nov. 14).—The ambassador's ball is a nest of spies. The war supply dealers' spy gets the secret despatch away from the international spy by using her woman's wiles upon him. The dealers are caught and are about to be shot when the girl spy discovers that the genuine despatch, which she has, will save them. She rides post-haste to the rescue, and arrives in time. A policeman, attracted by the shooting, demands to know "what you fellows are doing here." He sees some men a little way off and they approach him, one carrying a camera, another protesting: "Why, it's only a moving picture."

THE CHILD THOU GAVEST ME (Nov. 16).—John Graham, a young sailor, longs for a child of his own. At last a girl is born to him and his wife, and at the same time the wife of his friend, Robert Morris, also gives birth to a girl. While the men are away, Mrs. Morris dies, Mrs. Graham attending her in her last moments. Turning from the death bed, she finds her own baby dead. Frantic lest she lose her husband's love, she places the dead with the dead. Then her husband comes back from the sea bearing news which changes the currents of their lives and marks the unfolding of a drama remarkable for the haunting quality of its scenes.

ERNEST MALTRAVERS (Special — Two Parts—Nov. 17). Overtaken by darkness, Ernest Maltravers seeks a lodging for the night in the cabin of Darvil, a gypsy robber. Darvil and his comrade, Rigo, plan to kill the stranger for his valuables, but are forestalled by Darvil's daughter, Alice, who warns Ernest to flee. Discovering what she has done, Darvil turns her out into the night. Maltravers finds her alone on the moor, and takes her away. Later, they are secretly married under an assumed name, through Ernest's fear of disinheritance by his father. A newspaper story to the effect that his father is near death sends him post-haste to the old home, which he reaches just in time. After the funeral he returns to the cottage, but Alice is gone. She has been abducted by her father and Rigo. Eventually she escapes and, unable to find Ernest, wanders with her new born babe until fate rescues her. Later Maltravers and his wife are brought together.

HENPECK GETS A NIGHT OFF (Nov. 19).—Dick gives a candy-pull party, at which guests arrive in various stages of preservation. Henpeck's wife is sure not to let him come, but Dick writes a letter stating that he is very ill and asking Henpeck to come and nurse him. High jinks are interrupted by the entrance of Mrs Henpeck, but by ingenious ways her husband's innocence is joyously proven. He goes home triumphant, quite a hero, in fact, and the woman who told his wife is foiled.

A FOWL DEED (Nov. 19). A tramp steals Mrs. Dodo's chicken and wraps it in her new waist. Mrs Punk, a neighbor, presents her maid with a waist similar to that of Mrs Dodo, and the girl goes out riding with her sweetheart, a chauffeur, after putting on the waist. And later a detective finds a blood-spattered garment, thrown away by the tramp after cutting up the chicken, which leads to complications that cause uproarious laughter, ending in the arrest of everybody.

THE GIRL AND THE MISER (Nov. 20).—They called her a "sensible" girl because she was an adept at household duties and never wasted thought on finery. This trait in her character appealed strongly to Greene, the village miser, and he asked her hand in marriage. Then the young minister came on the scene, and her first temptation assailed the girl, and out of the humdrum incidents of her life there arose a tense little drama.

BLACKSMITH BEN (Nov. 21).—The village blacksmith's sweetheart meets an artist and elopes with him. Years later Blacksmith Ben sees the trouble that has embittered his life coming upon his young helper, Joe. Joe loves a girl named Daisy, whose cousin, May, secretly loves him. Glen Seymour, a landscape painter, meets Daisy and makes love to her. May tells Joe all about it, and seeks to win him for her own. Ben decides to take a hand and in a series of absorbing scenes he brings Daisy back to her lover's arms.

THE LEVEL (Nov. 23).—Motherless and isolated with her rough, unloving father, Carolyn Johnson becomes as wild and fierce-tempered as a tigress. Through an accident, she meets Bob Arnold, a young settler. While recovering from his injured leg, he conceives an affection for her and proposes, thinking that by surrounding her with an affectionate environment, her natural womanliness will be brought out. She at first refuses, but her father gruffly orders her to wed Bob. Used only to his iron will all her life, she sullenly assents, provided she be allowed to take her dog "Wolf" with her. After their marriage she repulses all Bob's well-meant kindnesses and makes him very unhappy. Accustomed only to the manners of the rough men with whom her father associated, she is unable to appreciate kind treatment, and looks upon her husband's attentions as weaknesses. She conveys her opinion to Wolf by telling the dog, "Ah, Wolf, he ain't like a man at all, he's too soft!" Bob overhears this remark, and it sets him thinking. From that time on, she finds a very decided change in her husband's manner towards her. He comes home harsh and brutal, with such an irritable temper she gets to half-dread his appearance. Strange to say, the peculiarities of her feminine nature cause her to think all the more of Bob and unconsciously her secret admiration for her strong-willed husband, changes, in spite of his brutality, to an intense love for him. The turning point arrives, when—in a specially ugly moment—he is apparently about to strike her. She grasps his hand and humbly caresses it in her mingled fear and love, saying, "I don't want to fight any more." He pauses, and when she places her hands on his shoulders presses her to him with a smile of triumph. He quickly tells her his brutality was only assumed and he is only too glad to bestow upon her the love and kindness, so essential to the happiness of both.

THE OLD FLUTE PLAYER (Special—Two Parts.—Nov. 24).—Herr Kreutzer, the flute-player at one of the cheaper London theaters, keeps his beautiful daughter, Anna, in strict seclusion, and seems to live in constant fear of espionage. Anna's only friend is M'rier, the slavey in their lodging house. While walking in the park one day, Herr Kreutzer recognizes a certain exalted personage, and greatly frightened, flees to America, with Anna. On the voyage she is saved from the undesirable attentions of Pietro Morosco by young Vanderlyn, a wealthy young man. He becomes interested in Anna and assists Herr to find suitable lodgings in New York. He secures a position for the girl as companion to his aristocratic mother, falls in love with Anna and proposes to her. She loves him, but declares she cannot marry him without her father's consent. He gives her a ring and tells her he is going to see Herr Kreutzer at once. Meanwhile, Mrs. Vanderlyn has seen the ring in her son's room,

...at being near her birthday, feels certain ... has purchased it as a birthday present for herself. The lady believes Anna has stolen it. A series of unpleasant complications occur, in the midst of which Herr Kreutzer takes from his pocket and opens an official-looking letter and triumphantly reveals himself to all as Count Otto Von Lichtenstal who years ago incurred the Emperor's displeasure, but is now forgiven. The ring incident is satisfactorily explained by young Vanderlyn. When haughty Mrs. Vanderlyn sees the official signature and seal of His Excellency, her snobbish objections to the match between her son and Anna vanish, and she sensibly acknowledges she has made a mistake. Mr. Vanderlyn takes Anna in his arms, while Mrs. Vanderlyn gives her very gracious consent to their marriage and accepts the escort of "the old flute-player," now "Count Otto."

NETTY OR LETTY (Nov. 25).—Twins in all but disposition, Netty and Letty quarrel continually. Letty goes to spend a few days at a friend's cottage at a nearby summer resort. Netty also goes later. Freddy meets Netty and they are mutually attracted. They are not allowed to be together much, however, as they are always being interrupted. The other girls decide to play a trick on Freddy. They send him a note saying Netty has found a place where they could have a quiet chat. They send him to where Letty is quietly reading. Freddy sits down beside her. She thinks a stranger is trying to flirt with her and abruptly leaves him with a disdainful glance. He is astounded, and the others, hiding nearby are convulsed with laughter. Freddy follows Letty until she calls an officer and he has a hard time explaining matters to avoid being arrested. The policeman finally lets him go, and while seated on the hotel porch, Netty, all dolled up for his benefit, appears, and that young gentleman, instead of looking pleased, as she expects, gives her a decided cold shoulder and leaves the place. She learns the meaning of the occurrence from a bellhop and she sends Freddy a note asking him to meet her on the beach and all will be explained. After some hesitation, his love for Netty proves too strong and he goes. He makes another mistake and causes all kinds of trouble when he again gets the girls mixed. Finally, he happens to confront both girls at once. Netty explains that they are twins, Letty apologizes to Freddy, then all walk off arm-in-arm. The other girls look after them pleased with the success and happy ending of their little joke. All then agree it is hard for any one to tell Netty from Letty.

CAUSE FOR THANKSGIVING (Nov. 26).—Sonny wants a baby brother, but Daddy tells him they are not for sale. He admits however, with a smile, that one may some day be left on the doorstep. Sonny takes this seriously and later finds a basket on the doorstep containing a monster Thanksgiving turkey which Daddy had ordered sent home. Sonny, of course, concludes the brother has arrived. He almost cries with disappointment on discovering it contains only "a old chicken-turkey." He meets Lily Ann, their colored washwoman's little daughter, hauling a coal-black pickaninny in a soapsbox on wheels. Seeing Sonny with the turkey, she offers to swap little Rastus for it, arguing that while her family has plenty of "chilluns," turkeys are scarce. Sonny is delighted and decides to surprise Daddy by putting the youngster in the basket and presenting it to him. Meanwhile Lily Ann returns triumphantly with the turkey, but finds her mother prefers her small black Rastus to all the Turkeys in the world. Followed by the whole troupe of brothers, sisters and the weeping Lily Ann, Mammy starts out in search of her child. At dinner Daddy boasts to everyone what a magnificent bird he has picked out for Thanksgiving dinner and almost faints on discovering the little black pickaninny in the basket, while the others roar with laughter. At this moment Mammy arrives, and amidst great excitement, recovers her "chile." Everything is explained when Sonny confesses and Mammy is made happy by placing a bill large enough to buy several turkeys in Rastus' hand. Sonny feels cheated, however, as he claims, "When you swap, you swap for keeps!" This is an excellent argument, but Daddy pacifies him by saying Christmas will soon be here so he better wait and perhaps Santa Claus will bring him a baby brother at that time.

THE CURING OF MYRA MAY (Nov. 29).—Becoming absorbed in Tennyson's Romantic Poems, Myra May, a girl of fourteen, can think of nothing but chivalry and romance. She scorns her former companions of her own age and dresses herself so as to appear much older. When Grayson, a young man from the city, appears in the village on business, and passes her in his natty clothes, she thinks him a veritable Sir Launcelot. They meet later, and he, deceived as to her age, falls in love with her. She sentimentally allows her imagination to run away with her and tells him about an unhappy home and her burning ambitions and her great desire to satisfy them where opportunities present themselves. He sympathetically proposes they elope to the city. She assents and her brother Jack, who overhears them, runs home and tells mother. The good woman makes a wild dash to where Myra and her cavalier are completing their plans for the coming elopement and marriage. Angrily confronting Grayson, she demands to know what it all means. He defends himself by saying he is in love with the girl and wishes to marry her. Mother quickly tells him that Myra is only a child and not of marriageable age. He stands speechless with astonishment, unable to express his apologies, while mother leads her weeping daughter home by the ear. No real harm has been done, and Myra, under her mother's wise counsel, comes to her senses. Thoroughly cured of her morbidly sentimental ideas, she goes back to the natural playmates of her own age, in short dresses and with her hair in a braid.

CONVICT COSTUMES AND CONFUSION (Special Two Parts—Nov. 28).—By a clever trick, Leary Mike, a convict, escapes from prison and makes his way to the city, closely pursued by the police. Jones, a gay old sport, has a date with a pretty girl, and goes to meet her at a masquerade ball, dressed as Mephisto. His wife learns of what is going on, and follows him. She chases him from the ballroom into the men's dressing room, but is stopped at the door by attendants. Mike, becoming desperate, climbs up the fire escape and into the dressing room. Jones sees him and has a bright idea. He offers the convict a hundred dollars to change clothes with him. This is quickly accomplished, then the police dash up the fire escape and arrest Jones as the escaped convict. Mrs. Jones breaks in the door and chases Mike until he escapes by jumping on an outgoing freight train. Jones tells his story to the magistrate, who calls up his wife. After he has begged her forgiveness, she verifies his story and he is set free. Meantime, Mike scares occupants of the freight caboose and steals their lunch. Seeing the police coming in a big automobile, he jumps off the train and runs into a crowd of negroes holding a camp meeting. Thinking Mike, in his costume, is the devil himself, they flee. Mike makes the colored preacher change clothes with him and then dashes off into the woods. The police keep right after him, however, and he is finally chased to the beach, where Jones and his wife are in bathing. Mike gets into Mrs. Jones' bathhouse and dresses up in some of her apparel. The police start a flirtation with the convict, now a "pretty girl," and Mrs. Jones seeing her missing clothes on Mike, starts a fight, which ends up by Mike being badly beaten and glad to be taken back to prison where he can enjoy a little peace.

THE THEFT OF THE CROWN JEWELS (Special—Two parts—Nov. 25).—The impoverished King of Eltwich Haldmandt plans an alliance between his daughter, Princess Zavia, and Prince Sacholdt, of Murtavia. The Prince, who has never seen Zavia, flees the country, as the time for the ceremony approaches, leaving word that he must marry as his heart dictates. Zavia, impressed by the failure of her father's plans, comes to the rescue by offering to sell the royal jewels in a foreign country. By chance, Prince Sacholdt is a passenger on the same steamer and makes her acquaintance.

Von Block, a fastidious thief on shipboard, is one day removing a cinder from his eye, holding his pocket mirror before him. He gets a reflection of Zavia in her stateroom inspecting the jewels. The flash of the mirror apprises Zavia that she is being watched and she later switches the hiding place of the jewels. Von Block's plans are temporarily thwarted. Leaving the vessel, Prince Sacholdt gives his name to Zavia as "Johann Schmidt," asking her to summon him if he can help her at any time.

On her way to a jewel broker's, Zavia meets with an accident arranged by Von Block, who secures the gems. She fears she will disclose her identity by informing the authorities and recalls "Schmidt," who comes to her aid. In locating Von Block and securing the gems, "Schmidt" suspects Zavia's identity. He wires his country, authorizing a loan to Eltwich and Zavia is mysteriously ordered to return with the jewels.

Later the alliance is renewed and Zavia finds, to her happy surprise, that "Schmidt" is the Prince.

TOUGH LUCK SMITH (Nov. 24).—Smith is anxious to attend a poker session which is to take place at 7.30 p. m. Knowing his wife will not allow him to leave home after supper, Smith writes himself a telegram reading "Come to the office immediately." He signs his partner's name to the message. Calling Jimmy, a messenger boy, Smith instructs him to deliver the telegram at 7 p.m. sharp. Jimmy, however, goes to a moving picture show that night and forgets all about the message. Smith, compelled to stay home and wash dishes, later goes to bed vowing to get even with the messenger boy.

When Jimmy discovers the telegram several hours later, despite the lateness of the hour, he rouses Mrs. Smith and delivers the message. The woman gives one glance at its contents and then compels her hubby to get out of bed and head for his office. On the way, it is just Smith's luck to get into a mixup which leads to his arrest as a burglar. The man spends the night in a cell. The following morning, alarmed by the absence of her husband, Mrs. Smith investigates. She discovers the telegram to have been a forgery. Reporting the matter to the police, Mrs. Smith learns of her hubby's predicament. Matters are explained and the poor man is released.

But the worst is still to come. While on their way home, the Smiths encounter Jimmy and his mother. When the boy commences to explain his delay the previous night, Mrs. Smith smells a large-sized mouse. Furious, Smith tries to hand the boy a spanking, but Jimmy's mother and Mrs. Smith get after the luckless man and then tough luck, Smith!

THE GIRL AND THE EXPLORER (Special—Two Parts Nov. 25). Desiring to first complete his story, Carlton, a famous explorer, evades the reporters upon arriving from South America. Millicent Beldon, daughter of a publisher, knows her father desires to secure Carlton's account of his adventures. An impulse leads the girl to call at the explorer's home.

Millicent is taken to be an applicant for the position of housemaid. A spirit of adventure causes her to accept the position. She and Carlton meet and love at first sight results. That night the explorer works on his story. Millicent, who has daringly determined to appropriate the manuscript, falls asleep in a chair in the hall. There Carlton finds her. Unable to resist the temptation, the explorer kisses her gently without waking her and hastens away. Meanwhile, alarmed by his daughter's disappearance, Beldon notifies the police.

The following morning the newspaper informs Millicent of the search being made for her. To conceal her identity from Carlton, she tears the story out of the paper. Carlton however, secures another copy and learns his maid's secret. Later, Millicent secures an opportunity to steal the explorer's story, but her love for him makes her realize the enormity of the offense.

Carlton later hears Millicent phoning to her father. Anxious to keep his presence in town secret, he severs the wire. Alarmed by the interruption, Beldon and several detectives ascertain Carlton's address and hasten to the house. Meanwhile, the explorer asks Millicent to marry him. She consents upon condition that he give the rights of his story to her father. And with her father and the officers hammering at the door, Millicent holds the ends of the severed wire together, while Carlton calls up a minister who marries them over the telephone.

HAM, THE ICEMAN (Nov. 27).—His job as street cleaner becomes tiresome to Ham—especially when he learns that Rubberheel, the inspector, has his eyes on him. Resigning his position, Ham launches upon an iceman's career. Bud, his son, hitches behind on his father's ice wagon, and thus learns that Ham loves the ladies. He sees his father endeavor to arrange a date with Mrs. Rubberheel. The latter, to get rid of the flirtatious iceman, agrees to meet him in the park. When the inspector returns home, he learns of what has happened.

Ham forgets Mrs. Rubberheel when he meets Alice, another of his customers. Again he makes a date. Alice agrees to meet him, but vows to give Ham the lesson of his life. Bud runs home and informs his mother of Ham's flirtations. Mrs. Ham promptly sets out for the spot where Ham is to meet Mrs. Rubberheel and Alice. The inspector proceeds to the rendezvous. He finds Dick, Alice's sweetheart, there. Mistaking each other for Ham, the two get into a fight. Matters are explained, however, and Ham later meets the enraged men. He flees. Arriving at the top of a hilly street ahead of his pursuers, he sends cakes of ice sliding toward them.

But Mrs. Ham arrives from the opposite direction. Ham gives one glance at her enraged countenance—and leaps off a bridge into a swiftly-running stream. His pursuers offer to rescue him, but Ham takes no chances of falling into his wife's hands. Waving farewell he sinks.

THE GIRL AT THE THROTTLE (The Third Episode of The Hazards of Helen—Nov. 28).—Blake, fireman of the light engine which is being taken West to Daleton, receives a message informing him that his wife is dangerously ill. Benton, his engineer, allows Blake to catch an eastbound passenger train. It is Benton's intention to pick up a fireman at the next station. A hunter shooting at a partridge just as the light engine is passing, wounds Benton. The engineer drops unconscious. Having seen the result of his shot, the sportsman rushes to a station nearby and reports the accident.

Helen, telegrapher at Downing Junction, receives word of the runaway shortly after the Eastbound Express has pulled out. Standing on the siding is a locomotive, the crew of which has gone to lunch. Climbing into the cab, Helen jerks the throttle wide open. Leaping forward, the engine rushes after the endangered express. Although her locomotive is almost derailed in rounding curves, the brave girl never slackens speed. Discovering his train is being pursued, the conductor of the Eastbound Express gives the signal to stop. Helen slows her engine down and tells of the danger which threatens. Then, while the Eastbound locomotive goes to meet the runaway, Helen's engine draws the cars to safety. The runaway is halted in the nick of time.

Helen's superb heroism again results in her being showered with offers of marriage. But the brave girl enjoys her hazardous adventures too much to marry anyone just yet.

HIS CHORUS GIRL WIFE (Nov. 23).—It was quite like the worldly Mr. Bruce to place a misconstruction upon Reggie's attentions to Gladys Warwick, but as the young people had kept their marriage secret, it was impossible for Mr. Bruce to understand his son's feelings, and as Reggie stood in awe of his father, he was forced to close up his newly furnished flat and tell Gladys to return home until he was able to arrange matters differently. She followed out this program, but in spite of her every effort, she was unable to keep her secret from her mother and after confiding in her, she happened to overhear a conversation between her parents in which her father spoke of her as having disgraced the family.

Outraged at this unjust treatment, she left the house, but on arriving at a railroad junction, who should she meet but Reggie and his father on their way to a Thanksgiving day reunion. The shock of this meeting added to her other worries, was too much for the young girl, and she fell in a faint. When she opened her eyes, she was startled to find that Mr. Bruce was attending her. She was trying to explain matters, but he had already understood, and just as Reggie returned with a glass of water, Mr. and Mrs. Warwick appeared on the scene, having started in search of Gladys as soon as her absence became known to them. The recognition of both of the old men that their fears were entirely unfounded, brought about a real feeling of thanksgiving, which was celebrated by them all with a distinct feeling that theirs was, in all reality, a real Thanksgiving celebration.

A GYPSY MADCAP (Nov. 24). Vance Coleman had landed his canoe when suddenly his eyes were greeted with the remarkable sight of a beautiful gypsy girl strutting around under the trees, while in her hands she held the very volume of Tennyson for which he was searching. His advent upon the scene startled her and she sprang away like a young wild thing, but quickly returned when he picked up her mandolin and began to play. Repeated meetings caused something more than mere friendship to spring up between the two young people and this sentiment was made fairly evident a short while after, when Vance rescued her from the embraces of Drew Martin, his cousin, and forced the young reprobate to make proper apologies for his conduct. This incident took place when Drew was on his way to meet Judge Stone, who had been summoned to the city to draw up General Coleman's will. Realizing that the general was wrapped up in his son, Drew saw a chance to get even with Vance, and, at the same time, feather his own nest. A slighting remark about Vance caused the general to ask for more details and on hearing of his son's infatuation for Olive, the gypsy girl, he faced him with it, and, being unable to make him change his plans, he furiously demanded of the judge to change the will so that it would read in Drew's favor, completely disowning Vance. The general's outburst culminated in a complete collapse, and the doctor being summoned, he informed them that the old gentleman was in a very serious state of health.

Judge Stone returned to the city and Drew was left in charge of his uncle, with a warning, under no circumstances, to give him more than three drops of medicine. It was during the period that news reached him of the discovery of his having forged his uncle's name, and fearing disclosure, he deliberately gave the general an overdose and fled from the cabin. Olive, in the meantime, had decided not to accept her lover's sacrifice and was on her way to the cabin when she came across the general's body. Quickly summoning Vance, she ran to the gypsy camp, and returned with an antidote for the poison, which saved the general's life. Gratitude quickly caused the general to view her in a different light, and won his consent to their marriage.

THE TEMPLE OF MOLOCH (Nov. 25). When young Dr. Jordan was called to Valatia to study the sanitary conditions in an effort to reduce the alarming death rate, he quickly discovered that the principal source of infection was Harrison Pratt's pottery factory together with the hovels which he maintained as tenements for his employees. Jordan called on Pratt and remonstrated with him, to no avail. A public preventorium was established to care for the incipient cases, and one of the most enthusiastic workers was Eloise Pratt. The mutual interest in humanitarian projects brought Eloise and Dr. Jordan together and in a short while their interest became more personal. The suffering among the poorer classes was very acute, the case of the Swanson family being a good illustration of the general condition. Dr. Jordan did all in his power to alleviate matters, but the fact that the Pratt factory and tenements remained in their original condition, made it practically impossible to stop the scourge.

Jordan was invited to the Pratt home on the occasion of Eloise's birthday party. The girl's beauty so captivated him that he declared his love for her and was accepted. Mr. Pratt, learning of this, became furious and ordered Jordan out of the house. Eloise did everything in her power to convince her father of Jordan's worthiness, to no avail, as Pratt's anger was added to by the appearance of an editorial written by Jordan in which he denounced the conditions on the Pratt properties. It was shortly after this that Eloise was taken ill and it developed that one of the Swanson girls had communicated the disease to the household. On the family physician's advice Jordan was called in and it was only owing to his skill that her life was saved. This happening thoroughly convinced Pratt of the real need of reform and he became reconciled to his daughter's marriage and even placed his country home at Jordan's disposal for a sanitarium.

THE KING'S MOVE IN THE CITY (Special —Two Parts—Nov. 27).—Lord Stranleigh's meeting with Lady Sinclair brought the young nobleman out of the atmosphere of boredom which had surrounded him for a long time, and he soon found that life was really worth living after all. His proposal to her was met, however, with a declaration on the young lady's part that until he should prove himself really worthy by accomplishing some real good in life, she could not entertain his suit. This conversation took place on the way home from a reception, and as they happened to pass a house on fire, Stranleigh tried to distinguish himself in the eyes of the fair lady by his activities in the rescues, but only succeeded in demonstrating the power of his money. Stranleigh was a mystery to most people, for though his attitude toward everything pertaining to business was that of an exceedingly bored man, back of his extreme affectation lurked one of the most brilliant minds in the financial world. Possessed of an enormous fortune which he delighted in using to overthrow dishonest dealers, he was often in a position to accomplish miracles and save innocent parties from ruin.

Just such an incident presented itself in the case of the McKellers, father and son, who had been caught in the toils of a clique of financiers who were attempting to freeze them out of a mining proposition, which they had opened up and made effective, by circulating false reports, in order to stampede the stock holders and gain complete control of the property. The McKellers were in despair when young John Hazel happened to drop into the office. On learning the facts in the case, Hazel insisted upon giving Peter a card of introduction to Lord Stranleigh.

Peter called upon the young nobleman and explained the whole affair, detailing just how he had made a careful examination of the property before his father would consent to underwrite the stock, and showing how the unscrupulous group were taking advantage of their positions to secure control of the majority. Stranleigh at once decided upon a scheme. Accompanying Peter to his father's office, he told him to give orders to twenty brokers to buy in a certain amount of stock when offered, and in this manner, not only was the scheming group defeated, but the market value of the property was greatly enhanced.

THE LAST OF THE HARGROVES (Nov. 28). —The feud between the Hargroves and the Buckners, like many other similar feuds, began over a mere trifle, and gradually grew in fury until Viney, on the one side, and Ben Buckner, on the other were the only survivors. Ben had been sent away to school before the feud had culminated, whereas Viney had remained in the mountains with Lige, a clansman of the Hargroves, who swore to her dying mother that when she was old enough to "tote a bear gun" and if there was a Buckner living, he would help her find him. A number of years later, Ben Buckner returned to investigate his heritage.

His meeting with Viney, the wood nymph, at Eagle Rock, came as a distinct surprise, and led to developments which he least expected. It so happened that Lige had likewise seen him as he made his way through the mountain trails, and recognizing in him a member of the hated Buckner clan, he urged Viney to join him in his hunt. She did so, without realizing that Ben was the object of the expedition. They failed to locate the intruder, but several days later, when Ben visited the cabin which Viney had pointed out from a distance, a shot rang out and Ben Buckner fell. Horrified at the result of her marksmanship Viney did all she could for the wounded man, and upon his recovery, the sheriff was called in to perform the ceremony, which wiped out the long standing feud between the Hargroves and the Buckner's, and brought peace to the hills and valleys, which owned both factions as masters.

SWEEDIE AT THE FAIR (Nov. 23).—Sweedie, the cook at the Rich household, buys a donkey from the captain of the police, but forgets to pay for it. He raids the house in an effort to get his money, and as a result Sweedie is "fired." Short of money and out of a job, the husky cook takes the donkey to the county fair where she hopes to win a few cash prizes. The donkey fails to take any blue ribbons, so Sweedie removes a ribbon from one of the prize horses and is caught in the act. She then ties her pet in a racing car and starts around the race track with the police in hot pursuit. She is finally brought to a halt when she drives the machine into a tent. Here an explosion takes place which completely wrecks the machine.

BEYOND YOUTH'S PARADISE (Nov. 24).—Captain Fane, an English army officer stationed at Cario, is in love with Lady Fiennis, who is treated most cruelly by her husband. Fane returns to England when he finds that she refuses to leave him. Five years later Fane's sister summons him to tell him that her son Frankie, who is only twenty-two years old, has decided to marry a widow many years his senior. She begs him to go to Cario and save the boy from this woman. Fane makes the journey, and upon his arrival Frankie tells him of his love for Lady Fiennis, now known as Mrs. Fenton, and how years before she had been infatuated with an army officer. Her husband discovered this and out of insane jealousy cut her off without a cent when he died. Fane listens with unusual interest to the boy's story, and when he brings in Mrs. Fenton, sure enough it is the woman he had loved all these years. She falls into his arms and Frankie leaves, realizing that youth's paradise is still ahead of him.

THE FABLE OF AGGIE AND THE AGGRAVATED ATTACKS (Nov. 25).—Aggie has survived the measles, mumps and scarlet rash, so when she brought home the high school diploma her parents thought she was a young lady now and couldn't catch anything more. That very fall she had a severe attack of photomania. She had the old folks posing for pictures half the time, and when she developed them you could almost tell which was which. When she was eighteen something terrible happened; she was seized with physical culture. She got busy in the gym and could hardly take time to eat. When the physical culture had its run, she was taken with actoritis. Shakespeare died before Aggie tackled "Lady Macbeth," but pa and ma were alive and had to stand for it. Just after this she got the art bug and Rosa Bonheur had nothing on her. At last she picked up a new kind of germ. It was the love microbe. When the suitor came to close the deal with pa, it was a pipe, so father rushed it through before the victim had a chance to change his mind.

SNAKEVILLE'S REFORM WAVE (Nov. 26). —Slippery Slim and his wife, Sophie, drive to town. While Sophie does her shopping Slim sneaks over to the saloon to get a few drinks. Here he meets Mustang, so the two drink together. Slim has promised his wife that he will not take a drink as long as he wears a certain ring on his finger, so takes off the ring before each drink. In the midst of their merriment Sophie enters the saloon. Slim almost dies of fright. Sophie rushes out where she meets a suffragette and is induced to join in the fight against the saloons. The day of election Slim and Mustang, whose wife is also a suffragette, are yanked to the polling place by their ears and forced to vote against the saloons. Sophie and her companions then go to every home bringing the women to the polls in flocks. The result is that the town goes dry by a large majority.

BRONCHO BILLY'S DOUBLE ESCAPE (Nov. 28).—Broncho Billy, an outlaw, while being pursued by the sheriff of Bear County, crosses the line into Gulch County. Later he is captured by the Gulch County authorities, who wire to the neighboring sheriff's office to send a man to bring the prisoner back. A deputy sheriff is sent and that night they stop at a small hotel. Broncho and the deputy become quite friendly and Broncho induces him to remove his handcuffs. While Broncho Billy sleeps the deputy steals downstairs and enters a card game. He loses heavily. He returns to the room and tells Broncho of his loss. They then both turn in for the night. While the deputy sleeps, Broncho slips his gun from his pocket, goes downstairs and holds up the gamblers. Without waking his guardian, he places the loot on the table, then writes a note, telling the deputy that he has gone to the boundary and will be waiting for him there. The deputy awakes and is overjoyed at finding his money returned. He wires to the Bear County sheriff SCARS OF POSSESSION (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 27). The death of his father leaves young Payne Forsythe entirely alone in the world. The Forsythe money has gone; the Forsythe family had died. One desperate situation tumbles after the other. Tossing the last of his fortune into the "street" Payne leaves town for a year. He returns penniless, with nothing in sight. A newspaper ad attracts his attention, and he is selected, from among a dozen applicants, to give up some healthy blood to save a young woman's life at a nearby hospital. The operation is successfully performed, but Payne is not allowed to see the girl's face or know her identity.

A week later he leaves the hospital, but with a gnawing desire to know who the girl was. The incident acts as a turning point. Payne meets an old friend and goes to work on the stock exchange. Two years later he is a partner in the business, with a tidy personal fortune. He meets J. Dukes Cortwright, a young millionaire, and falls in love with his charming sister, Louise, at a bridge party. Time passes and Payne realizes his love is not returned. Heartbroken, he questions Louise one evening and is dumbfounded when she shows him a scar on her wrist and tells him she feels she belongs to an unknown young man, who gave his life blood to save her in an operation two years before. That's how J. Dukes Cortwright came in a moment later to behold his dearest friend kissing his dearest sister.

SELIG.

OUT OF PETTICOAT LANE (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 23).—Mrs. McCarthy, formerly a housemaid for Marie Stuart, owns a laundry. She finds herself embarrassed for the rent money and sends Meg Morris, one of the girls working in her laundry, to Miss Stuart, requesting a loan of $20. Meg finds Miss Stuart entertaining her fiance, Walter Sumpter. Meg has become drenched in a heavy rain, and Marie invites her to her boudoir, where she gives her dry shoes and stockings. Meg sees a photograph of Walter's bungalow in the hills, and exclaims that she could die happy if she could enjoy only one vacation in the woods. Walter overhears the remark, and writes a note requesting Meg (without mentioning her name, however) to go to Woodland and become caretaker of the house; also enclosing money to pay for her services and the expense of the journey. He places the note containing the money in a pocket of Meg's jacket hanking on the back of a chair

When Meg returns to the room and dons her jacket, she does not discover the envelope and its contents. "Biff" Nelson, a tough individual employed as a delivery man for the laundry, meets Meg returning from Marie Stuart's house. He demonstrates his unwelcome infatuation for Meg by seizing her in his arms, embracing her and declaring his love and affection for her. Jessie Mack, another employee in the laundry, is in love with "Biff." She sees him embracing Meg and at once jumps to the conclusion that Meg is trying to win the affections of "Biff" away from her. Jessie has a furious temper, which is aroused by the incident, and when Meg enters the laundry she engages her in a rough and tumble scrap to the great consternation of Mrs. McCarthy and the other employees. Jessie is so evidently at fault and her attack so unwarranted that Mrs. McCarthy discharges her at once.

Upon her return home to her tenement room, Meg finds the note and money in her pocket. As she is reading the note, she hears a noise in the street, and running to the window, sees "Biff" engaged in a rough and tumble fight with an Italian fruit peddlar. Jessie has been awaiting her opportunity to inflict her vengeance upon Meg, and while the latter is viewing the street fight from the window, Jessie silently enters the room, seizes a stove poker and strikes Meg a vicious blow on the back of the head, rendering her unconscious.

Jessie sees the note and the money on the table, and believing that she has killed Meg, decides to run away. Inasmuch as the note does not name Meg, she decides to assume that it refers to her and determines to take advantage of the circumstances to hide in Sumpter's bungalow as the unnamed caretaker. On the following morning Jess arrives at Woodland, but her conscience returns her and she considers self-destruction by springing over a high cliff. She has a vision of Meg pointing an accusing finger at her and in her anguish and terror falls in a swoon. Sumpter discovers her lying there unconscious and carries her to the bungalow. In the meantime, Marie Stuart has arrived at the bungalow in her automobile to visit her fiance. She intends to surprise Walter and is indignant to find him attending upon another woman. Jess escapes from the bungalow, and pursued by her remorse, attempts to jump over the cliff.

In the meantime, Meg has resumed consciousness, and remembering the address given in the note, hurries to Woodland, where she arrives just in time to confront Jess in her attempt at suicide. Jess thinks her to be another vision, but Meg calms her and forgives her. Marie and Walter, who have arrived at an understanding by mutual explanations, have discovered the escape of Jess and follows her to the cliff in time to overhear her confession, and to note the forgiveness accorded by Meg.

The two girls become friends and enjoy immensely their visit to the country. They become healthy and strong and engage in the rural pastimes. They meet two honest young men, farmers, who become infatuated with the two pretty city girls. Mrs. McCarthy gives a picnic to her laundry employees at Woodland, and the party discovers Mrs. McCarthy's two ex-employees, Jess and Meg, with their rural swains. "Biff" enters the lists again, but the two country youths vanquish him. The lovers marry and find happiness in their new country home.

THE SCAPEGOAT (Nov. 24).—Tom Jackson, a young man of good family, is elected sheriff. He is in love with Nell Turner, whose brother, Jack, is a reckless young fellow and belongs to a gang of bank robbers. Tom is popular and loves Nell dearly, while she returns his affections, and they have announced their engagement. Nell has a deep, sisterly love for her scapegrace brother Jack, and has always stood between him and punishment for various minor offenses.

Tom does not know that Jack belongs to the gang of robbers and one day when the news is announced that the bank has been robbed, Tom organizes a posse and goes in pursuit. He captures the bank robbers, discovering to his surprise that Nell's brother Jack is one of the criminals. His love for Nell prompts him to permit Jack's escape; while he leaves the country, thus making himself the scapegoat. Thus he demonstrates his loyalty as a lover.

THE BUTTERFLY'S WINGS (Nov. 25).—Gay La Rue, a spoiled society girl, is surrounded by a host of admirers whom she keeps at a distance because she does not wish to marry anybody at the present time. She has certain depths of character, however, which have never been sounded. Wearied by a succession of social triumphs, she departs for a village on the seacoast, where she intends to rest. While walking on the sands of the seashore she discovers Elsa and Karl, two village lovers, who rejoice in the affection of each other. Gay, the social butterfly, without thinking of the consequences, engages in a flirtation with Karl and he becomes enamored of her beauty and charms.

Elsa discovers the falsity of her lover and pleads with the "butterfly" to release him. Gay has unsuspectingly fallen deeply in love with Karl and hotly refuses to give him up at first but finally agrees to give him back to Elsa. When Karl next calls on her at the hotel, she treats him coldly and sends him back to Elsa. Gay goes home and marries a wealthy suitor, but the picture of Karl remains indelibly upon her heart as a penalty of her flirtation.

A SURPRISE PARTY (Nov. 27).—Mrs. White sees a stylish hat in a millinery window, and wants hubby to buy it, but he refuses on account of the price. Mrs. Brown, a friend of Mrs. White, buys the hat, puts its on and starts to wear it home. On the way, it begins to rain, and fearing that the hat will be ruined, Mrs. Brown steps into Mr. White's office and puts the new hat in a box and resumes her old one. Mrs. White comes to the office, discovers the hat and is delighted at what she things to be her husband's thoughtfulness, because she thinks he has bought it for her. She expects White to bring the hat home.

The next day Mrs. White sees her husband on the street with Mrs. Brown, who is wearing the hat. Mrs. White is convinced of his disloyalty. She notifies Mr. Brown and they decide to follow White and Mrs. Brown, disguising themselves with lamp black. But Mrs. Brown and Mr. White have been arranging a surprise party on Mrs. White. Together they call at the homes of various friends to assemble for the party, followed by Brown and Mrs. White disguised as negroes. These two are arrested by the police as suspicious characters. Mr. White is called to the station to release them, after which an explanation is made all around.

THE FATES AND RYAN (Nov. 28).—Michael Ryan is a mounted policeman. He has a great affection for his horse, Sammy. CORRECTIONS.

In order that its program should not exceed twenty eight reels per week, the Universal Company has removed its Powers release for November 13 from its program for the week beginning November 9, and has now scheduled it for release on November 27. The title of the picture is "Siss Dobbin's Oil Magnate," and a synopsis of it will be found on page 824 of the issue dated November 7.

It would appear that "Mother's Darling Little Boy," a synopsis of which was published on page 990 of last week's issue, that that subject is released by the Kinetophote corporation, as it was placed under that heading. This is an error as the picture is an Eclectic release and should have been put under this caption. Our readers will please observe this correction.

RACE FOR A BRIDE (Oct. 29).—Gus and Arthur are rivals for the hand of the fair Emma. Both propose at different times and are accepted. Arthur returns and finds his rival with Emma. Gus, not hearing the calls of the Justice, continues madly back to the house. Arthur, on arriving in the wrong town, is mistaken for a horse thief and is thrown into jail, but in time, by a supreme effort, he tears the bars apart and escapes, followed by the Justice who arrested him. They arrive at Emma's home and the Justice finds that Arthur is the wrong man and makes amends by performing the ceremony. Gus arrives in time to hear the final words pronounced. The other Justice, enraged by the treatment received, follows close on his trail.

Noodles quietly sneaks into bed beside a form which he thinks is his wife. All is well until he goes to pat his wife's face and finds a face with whiskers. Brown rolls over, and getting a whiff of Noodles' breath, becomes conscious immediately; both sit up in bed and the two strangers face each other. A fight starts. Craig comes home and, finding the blackhand sign upon the door and his little son missing, becomes frantic. He summons Skylark Fumes, a famous detective, to find his child. The detective arrives and after seeing many blackhand marks decides there must be at least a thousand blackhanders in the gang. THE MYSTERIOUS ROSE (Second of "My Lady Raffles" Series—Two Parts—Nov. 24).—The son of the District Attorney "has" something on the crooked ward boss, which makes the latter uneasy. Knowing the young man is infatuated with the adventuress, known as "My Lady Raffles," he approaches her with a proposition to put the boy out of the way. She will not agree to this. He arranges with one of his own crooks to have him assasinate the boy.

That evening "My Lady Raffles" breaks with the son of the District Attorney. He threatens to kill himself. Leaving her, he returns home to carry out his plan of self-destruction. It happens that "My Lady Raffles" and her gang have planned a raid upon the safe of the District Attorney that evening. They are admitted to the house by the butler, an accomplice. "My Lady Raffles" assists in tying the butler to a chair after the job is done to allay suspicion of his connection with the crime. She unintentionally drops a rose she is wearing. Outside, the crook in the employ of the ward boss, seeing the District Attorney's son in his room fires with deadly effect.

Next morning the District Attorney finds his son dead and his safe looted. Detective Phil is put on the case. In the young man's room he finds a rose, and finds the young man's gun is empty. Below they find the butler tied to the chair. Kelley discovers a rose similar to the other on the floor.

The ward boss is present during the detective's examination. Unseen by the others, the ward boss finds a note on the floor of the boy's room addressed to "My Lady Raffles," in which he tells of his intention and bids farewell, also mentioning the details of their quarrel. This he places in his pocket. Having secured all his clews, Kelley becomes suspicious of the ward boss's action. When the latter leaves he follows him to the den of "My Lady Raffles." He overhears a conversation between the two in which the Ward Boss taunts her with the note he has found, claiming he can connect her with the robbing of the safe and the death of the young man. Kelley observes that the room is decorated with the identical kind of rose of which he has two samples. His chain of evidence is complete. He confronts the two crooks. "My Lady Raffles" makes a clever escape, but Kelley detains the crooked Ward Boss under arrest.

AS WE JOURNEY THROUGH LIFE (Nov. 24) Old Uncle Eli, as the day is fading, draws his comfortable chair and opens the old family album. As he turns the leaves of the book he also turns the leaves of memory and muses on the faces of his loved ones.

Another picture, the old horse and buggy and he and Jennie. The old man sobs yet as he remembers the day he knelt by Jennie's bed and knew she was gone and here's the new photo of daughter. He remembers how she and Tom came and took him in after Mother died, how they forgave him.

The old man sighs, and suddenly there is a scurry of little feet and Tom's little son rushes to Grandpa for a story.

THE GHOST OF THE MINE (Nov. 29). A young city fellow had been left, as part of his inheritance from a deceased uncle, a mine in the west. Arriving there, he is shown through by the old, half breed caretaker. As they pass through the tunnels they see in the distance the astral form of what appears to be an Indian maiden of rare beauty. The young owner is astonished and that evening in the old caretaker's hut, he is told the story of the ghost of the mine.

Years before the uncle, now dead, had come to these parts a prospector. He had fallen in love with the daughter of a hotelkeeper and this love had been returned. A beautiful half-breed Indian girl fell a victim to his charms. While her love was of the humblest variety, she sought in many little ways to show her regard.

A prowling Mexican causing trouble around the camp had been warned off by the uncle. The Mexican swore revenge. He saw his chance when the Indian went into the mine to clean the uncle's gun. He tried to force his attentions on her. There was a struggle. The Mexican, with the uncle's gun killed the girl.

Evidence pointed to the uncle as the guilty man. The Mexican had escaped, leaving the prospector behind. According to western justice, the miners decided to string the prospector up. His fiancee was heartbroken. That night, while she was riding home, by the way of the mine, the spirit of the dead girl suddenly showed itself. It beckoned her. The fiancee followed over a precipitous path in the mountains where in a hut she found the Mexican with a broken leg. The Mexican confessed to her the spirit faded away.

In this way the uncle had been saved. The girl's spirit had always haunted the mine.

Her mother, a singer, had married the only son of a wealthy man. This son was disinherited for connecting the family with a stage-performer. Eve seeks her dressing room to hide her tears. There Gordon finds her and is unable to withhold expressions of love back. Eve is happy until she learns from another member of the company that Gordon is married. She remembers her nurse's warning about the perfidy of men; she determines to seek out her father and never see Gordon again. She departs.

Meantime Gordon receives a telegram to the effect that his wife, who had left him, is dead. In vain he seeks Eve to tell her. Eve has found her father. His friend, Austin, falls in love with Eve. The father is in favor of the match in that he owes Austin big sums of money.

THE BRAND OF HIS TRIBE (Two Parts—Nov 28).—Lieutenant George Wilcox is one of the officers at a western army post. Wolftail is chief of a tribe of near-by Indians, who, while not hostile, are anything but friendly toward the soldiers. Later, trouble breaks out. Wolftail leads his braves against the post, but is defeated.

Col. Brown, who is in command of the cavalry, decides upon a night attack. He follows the Indians to their camp, surprises them and again is victorious. In the general melee, however, Lieut. Wilcox falls, badly wounded, before the tepee of Wuateka, Wolftail's daughter. She drags the officer inside the tepee, and proceeds to ease his sufferings. In the early dawn, while the Indians are breaking camp, several squaws discover Wilcox. They notify Wolftail, who carried her to the camp upon the day when she was bitten by a "rattler." Wolftail relents and the wounded Wilcox is carried away by the Indians.

Five years elapse. The officer's comrades, having given him up for dead, have almost forgotten him. But Wilcox has remained with the Indians as the husband of the chief's daughter. Wolftail, having noted his daughter's attachment for the white man, forced him to marry her on threat of death. Wilcox's choice was marriage. During the years he has done his best to live up to his obligations. A son has been born to the pair. One day, as the child is playing, a scout, en route to the post, is attracted by the sword which the child carries. He investigates and carries the word back to the post. A rescuing party, led by Captain Duncan, a pal of Wilcox, is formed; the Indian camp is visited and Wilcox is freed and taken back to the post with his son.

The chief, for his daughter, tries to recover the child. A battle follows in which Wilcox is killed. Before he dies he gives his son into the care of his friend Duncan.

Twenty years later finds Wilcox, Jr., joining his foster-father at the post, after having graduated from West Point. With Wilcox comes Major Green and his daughter, Marie, Wilcox's fiancee. Col. Duncan, learning of the boy's love affair, considers it his duty to inform Major Green that Wilcox is a half-breed. Whereupon the Major refuses to sanction the match. It is at this point that Lieut. Wilcox informs the two officers that if he is not good enough to marry a white woman, he is not good enough to fight for her. Tearing off his shoulder straps, the lieutenant escapes to the camp of Wolftail. Here he is recognized by his old Indian mother, after he has been wounded. Marie is taken prisoner, but she is more than satisfied when she finds Wilcox at the camp. She nurses him.

And a rescue party from the post finds the pair together. Marie refuses to give her half-breed lover up, defies her father and wins her point.

THE EMPIRE OF ILLUSION (2d of the Terence O'Rourke, Gentleman Adventurer, Series—Two Parts Nov. 23).—Terence O'Rourke, gentleman adventurer, is in love with the Princess Beatrix de Grandlieu and is heading a party for the relief of her brother who is in peril in the desert of Sahara. With the party are also Adolph Chambret, legal adviser to and in love with the Princess. The Prince de Grandlieu, Beatrix's husband, some time before the action of this story, has spent most of his wife's money and has conceived a plan for getting rid of her brother, whose money reverts to the Princess at his death. The boy, although a spendthrift, has great ambitions. The Prince, playing on these ambitions, has persuaded him to establish an empire upon the desert of Sahara and make himself Emperor. After arriving there, the boy overhears two of the Prince's followers plotting his death. The plan is to have Arabs attack the oasis where they are in camp and exterminate the entire party. The boy sends for help from his sister. She, having just met O'Rourke and knowing him to be a brave man, has him take charge of the relief party.

They arrive on the desert just in time to save the oasis being captured by Arabs. Once there, the Prince persuades the boy that he had nothing to do with the plot and he believes him. The Arabs demand tribute and O'Rourke advises paying them. The Prince, through one of his confederates, bribes the Arab to abduct the boy Emperor, and through the same man he plans to assassinate O'Rourke. That night the man makes the attempt, but fails. He is captured by Danny O'Rourke's servant.

Chambret, thoroughly aroused, taunts the Prince into fighting a duel, and kills him. The Arab, at the time the tribute was paid, saw the Princess and fell in love with her. He arrives at the oasis to carry out a plan of abduction. Failing to find the Prince's confederate, who has been put in the guard house, he abducts the Princess instead. O'Rourke hears of this and at the risk of his life rescues her and kills the Arab chief. In revenge for the death of their chieftain the Arabs gather reinforcements from a neighboring tribe and attack the oasis. O'Rourke and his party are forced to retreat. Before reaching the boats, O'Rourke sends the non-combatants to the rear and he and his men check the oncoming attack. At the boats the party endeavors to launch them and leave O'Rourke to his fate, but the Princess forces them to wait for him, at the point of a gun. O'Rourke and his men finally arrive at the boats and they put to sea.

The Princess and O'Rourke, now that the Prince is dead, are free to love as they will. The fall of the Empire marks the beginning of the romance of Terence O'Rourke.

THE HEART OF THE NIGHT WIND (Two Parts—Nov. 27).—Night Wind, so named by the Indians, has been brought up by a Siwash and is considered as a half-breed. She is taken in by the mother of the foreman of a big lumber camp and assists the old lady in housework. The foreman, John Daly, is in love with her, but keeps this a secret. Walter Sandry, a new owner of the lumber camp, appears unexpectedly to run things himself. The rough men of the camp look upon him as an Eastern tenderfoot. He does this by licking the camp bully. But he had plenty of grit and makes up his mind to win their respect. He wins the love of Night Wind by giving her his beautiful horse to ride. One day, in a temptuous fit of emotion, he kisses her. This is constituted among the Indians equivalent to a betrothal of marriage. From then on Night Wind looks upon him as "her man."

A New York society girl, Dolly Ordway, an artist, comes to the lumber camp in search of local color. She is given quarters by Walter Sandry. Dolly also falls in love with Walter. Night Wind suspects this and her semi-savage jealousy is difficult to restrain. Dolly tries to win Walter to a declaration of marriage. Several times he is on the point of succumbing when the thought of the simple but beautiful child of nature obtrudes itself.

There is a rival lumber company in the neighborhood. The owner falls violently in love with Dolly. He discovers that she is in love with Walter, although she has likewise been flirting with him. He is furiously jealous and determines to ruin his rival. He blows up a raft of lumber with dynamite. Walter is on the raft; he is seriously injured. He is carried to the camp unconscious and both Night Wind and Dolly vie with each other to nurse him. Dolly takes a mean advantage of the situation by declaring that Walter is her affianced husband. This enrages Night Wind. However, the foreman's mother decides that Dolly is entitled to nurse him. Walter recovers and is angry at hearing that he is supposed to be engaged to Dolly. He denies that it is so. This so enrages Dolly that she determines to ruin him.

About this time Walter has taken an order for a large shipment of logs. To fail to fulfil this order means the loss of a large guarantee which he has put up—in other words, ruin. Knowing this, the jealous rival visits the men working for Walter and prevails upon them to strike. Walter is in a desperate position.

Night Wind appreciates the situation and without saying anything to her "man," she travels through the forest on foot to the Indians camp. They know and love her as one of their own and have a great deal of respect for what she says. To the chief Night Wind puts her case; she tells him of the strike and asks him to send his braves to handle the logs and thereby save her lover. The chief consents; he calls his braves together and leads them over the hills to the lumber camp. They are working the logs when Walter discovers their presence.

The rival lumber man tries to bribe the Indians to quit with money and whiskey. The chief is about to give way to the temptation of whiskey when Night Wind appears beside him. The work is continued. The great dam is lifted and the logs, sufficient to fill the order, rush down the flume.

Night Wind finds her reward in the faithful love of Walter.

REDBIRD WINS (Two Parts—Nov. 16).—Colonel James Dinwidty, a Southern gentleman, is the father of a beautiful daughter, Fern, and the owner of some of the fastest race horses in Tennessee. A new colt is born on the plantation which Fern names Redbird, and the Colonel has the pedigree certificate made out under that title. Chick Mace and Ray Connors come to Dinwidty's looking up race horses. Happening to see Redbird's certificate they secretly make note of it. Two years later, the Colonel has payed poker debts with everything he owns, except Redbird. He decides to make his last bet on the two-year old's first race, and writes Philip Pierpont for a loan of $100,000, promising that he will give him the horse, win or lose. Pierpont, who is in love with Fern, sends the Colonel the money. Chick Mace and Ray Connors have covered most of the $100,000. Knowing Redbird's pedigree they realize that their only chance of winning the money is to make the animal "logie," so that night they put doped grain into her manger. Pierpont, however, has followed them. He removes the grain—the conspirators being none the wiser. The next day the Colonel's colored jockey is hurt and unable to enter the race. The start is to be called in fifteen minutes. Fern, who is the only other person who thoroughly understands Redbird, hurries into a jockey costume and rides her father's horse to victory. Faithful to his promise, the Colonel offers Redbird to Pierpont, who replies, "It is not Redbird I want, but your little jockey."

In his ignorance he does not know how to get word to Rosa, and neighbors take the forsaken child to an orphanage. When, after months of waiting, Beppo is released, he finds his few household goods disposed of and Rosa gone. Meanwhile, Mr. and Mrs. Lyons, attracted to the pretty little Italian girl, have adopted her. In his wanderings in quest of his lost daughter, Beppo comes to the Lyons' beautiful home where he sees a child whom he believes is Rosa. But to make sure, he plays an old melody which she used to love on his accordion. The child runs to the gate and into his arms.

THIS acknowledged masterpiece—now controlled by the Box Office Attraction Company, of New York—will show earnings in excess of $250,000 before its money-getting possibilities have been exhausted. The two, three and four reel Balboa dramas are proportionately magnetic, the photography is above criticism, the scenes brilliant and beautiful, and the acting superb. The plays and the stories back of them are absorbingly interesting—thrilling—gripping—and never fail to hold the spell-bound attention of the audience. of jealousy, he steathily follows them into the room where they have gone, flings open the door and sees them at the bedside of his child, for whom a doctor and a railroad nurse are in attendance. Then he learns that it is through Stone's efforts that little Marion has been saved from a terrible accident; and also that the confidential talks between his wife and Stone were really for the purpose of reconciling Stone with a friend of Mayre's, Jean Scott, whom he hopes to marry.

BEAUTY.

MOTHERHOOD (Nov. 10).—The girl and the man meet in Love's Garden, and together they discover the Flower of Love. They are married, and all is happiness—until the call of motherhood comes to the wife. In the garden, baby faces in a vision appear to her. She is rebellious, repulses her husband and takes refuge in her room, where she falls asleep and dreams of the coming of the child and its evil consequences. It seems to her that the boy brings discord and estrangement between his parents. He himself is sorry he ever was born, and at last pushes his mother aside and striking his father he runs away. The woman wakes. She realizes that it is criminal to resist motherhood. Seeking her husband, she reassures him of her love, and together they rejoice in the coming of the child.

KEYSTONE.

HIS MUSICAL CAREER (Nov. 7).—Tom is out of work. Longing for a draught of beer he presents himself at a piano establishment and gets taken on as a piano mover. He then gives an exhibition of his tremendous strength, and he and another muscular employe are told to deliver a piano at the home of Mr. Rich and take one away from the house of Mr. Poor. Of course they get the houses twisted, and after several excruciatingly funny scenes, both piano movers land in the river with the piano on top of them.

"CURSES!" THEY REMARKED (Nov. 5).—They are true blue villains, both of them, and they are father and son. What is more to the point, they also are crooked lawyers. The son's wife is allowed none of the pleasures of life, but is obliged from morning till night to wash dishes, clean house, keep the rum bottle filled, and to discharge faithfully other innumerable duties which her husband sees fit for her to do. The lawyers are made the legal advisers of a pretty young girl. They plot that Villain, Jr., shall marry the girl and get the money—the disposal of the present Mrs. Villain, Jr., to be left to the future. However, the girl finds an able ally, and together they break the fact to the wife. She joins her muscle to theirs, well developed by her years of hard work—and father and son are worsted. In the finale the son comes crashing through the walls of his father's bedroom in a cycle car, nearly paralyzing the latter with fright. They both take a drink, however, and call it square.

MAJESTIC.

THE ODALISQUE (Two Parts—Nov. 15).—May and Annie work in a fashionable millinery store, where the buyer, struck by May's beauty, advances her to a position among the models. She gets a little money, but finds that she is obliged to wear better clothes, which she has a hard time getting. When Curtiss, a very gentlemanly individual, appears upon the scene and is evidently attracted to May, she gives the cold shoulder to Joe, the wagon driver, who is in love with her, and allows Curtiss to pay her marked attention. Annie, her friend, warns her that the newcomer may not be on the square, but May, in her struggle to make both ends meet, wear good clothes and to hold her job, allows herself to be buoyed up by the dinners and theaters which Curtiss lavishes upon her. In time also she permits him to buy her an expensive dress. The next day, seized with remorse, and fearing Curtiss, May asks permission to return the dress. He directs her to the supposed dressmaker in reality, a procuress—and Joe, following her thither, discovers her danger. Curtiss arrives on the scene of the trap he has laid for the girl—and he and Joe fight it out. Thus the wagon driver rescues May from the clutches of "a gentleman."

THE LITTLE COUNTRY MOUSE (Nov. 17).—Dorothy, the attractive and unsophisticated daughter of a country clergyman, is invited to Newport by her fashionable cousin for a week-end visit. After a day of sightseeing, she is transformed by borrowed finery into a social butterfly and taken to a society function. Blundering into a heavy game of bridge she loses a large sum to her hostess, who presses her for payment. A middle-age roue induces her to accept his check for the amount which she endorses and turns over to her hostess. Then, to her consternation, the roue insists on a quid pro quo for his money. As Dorothy cannot appeal to her father for money for a gambling debt, she is in a dilemma. She confides her story to Lieutenant Hawkhurst. He bribes a social "tame cat" to part with some of the hostess's love-letters, and using them as a bludgeon, finally compels the lady to hand over the check. He then tears it up before the roue's eyes, and throws him out of the place. In time the Lieutenant and Dorothy are engaged.

ANOTHER CHANCE (Nov. 24).—Mason, discharged from jail, promises his wife to lead a new life. While searching for work, he rescues Curly, a newsboy, from the clutches of a tramp, who, in trying to steal the boy's secret hoard, beats him up badly. Mason leaves the now helpless boy in care of his wife, and resumes his search for work. At the motor factory they tell him he will be notified of the first vacancy. Utterly discouraged in his attempt to obtain immediate employment, he yields to temptation, when a former pal of his tells him how easy it is to pass bad coins.

Detective Flynn is shadowing the counterfeiter, and captures him red-handed. Mason, with a lot of bad coin in his possession, is pursued but gets away. Arriving home and believing he has eluded the detective, he resolves once more to be honest, and rejoices as his wife shows him a letter saying there is now a vacancy in the factory, but his joy is short lived, as Flynn has shadowed him home, and arrests him while he still has the bad money in his possession. The detective searches, finds some worthless coins and puts them on the table near the door of an adjoining room, while he makes a more thorough search. Curly, in the adjoining room, has now recovered from his beating. He listens and learns the trouble his benefactor is in. He then takes the coins from his secret hoard, and substitutes good money for the bad. He then gets away through an open window. Flynn, after a vain search, gathers the coins from the table and takes Mason to the station house. The coins are found to be good. Mason is discharged and gets to the factory in time to get the position. That night, as Mason and his wife are talking over the affair, they are puzzled, but very glad to get another chance.

Curly gets his revenge by tempting the tramp to steal the bad coins, and then notifying the police.

RELIANCE.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 44 (Nov. 16).—Margaret and Aunt Abbie were weary of ultra-modern New York. Our Mutual Girl suddenly had a bright idea. "Let's go looking for the really old places in this town," she suggested. "There are any number of them, I've heard, and yet I've seen but few. But I should like to see an architectural yesterday rubbing shoulders with a tomorrow. Wouldn't you?"

"Indeed I should, child," Aunt Abbie replied. "Even seeing yesterday and today together would be a treat."

They motored away from the shopping district, discussing this building and that, and trying to decide just what it was that made New York different from any other city in the world. Was it really the spirit of progress, Aunt Abbie wondered, or merely the fever of unrest? All this time the humming limousine was making its way up a western drive. It had purred through the more densely crowded streets and was now skimming past houses set back from the curb, with little lawns and pretty shade trees in front of them. Suddenly Margaret pointed to a ramshackle old house, in sharp contrast to the huge apartment buildings only a few blocks in the rear. It evidently was a mansion of long departed splendors.

"Oh, look! Aunty, that is the house I was dreaming about when you woke me this morning!" cried Our Mutual Girl. "We must go through it." She signalled the chauffeur to stop. Half way up the walk Margaret stopped short, grasped Aunt Abbie's arm, and exclaimed excitedly.

"And there is the very woman I saw in my dream. This is too curious for words!"

An old woman, as forsaken in appearance as the place she lived in, was coming toward them. As she came nearer and gazed into Our Mutual Girl's face, she turned a ghastly white under the pallor of age. "Who are you?" she cried. "Have you come back to torment me? Are you the spirit of my lost youth?" Then, feverishly grasping Margaret by the hand, she led her indoors, Aunt Abbie following. From the antique mahogany table she took a photograph in a valuable frame.

"This is a picture of me when I was your age," she said holding it out to Margaret. And indeed the resemblance to Our Mutual Girl was startling. Then, telling her visitors to sit down, the old woman poured out to them the tragedy of her youth.

Almost fifty years before she had loved Walter Van Horn, but her father insisted that she marry another man whom instinctively she feared and disliked. His name was Arthur Houston. The young men, who had been friends, came violently to dislike one another. The result was inevitable—that is, for those days. For then it was not considered disgraceful for two men to fight over a woman's hand.

Arthur came to Mary boasting of his triumph over her heart's choice. She questioned him with agony in her soul. That he had knocked Walter down and beaten him soundly, this he confessed—but more than this? She persuaded him to lead her to the spot where they had fought.

"But you'll not find him there," he said. "He'll be seen around here no more." When they reached the place Mary accused Arthur of having killed her lover. As she told the tale, the old woman's voice trailed off into a sob. Then she fixed her wild eyes on a spot just over Margaret's head.

"Look! There behind you!" she cried. "There are the spirits of Arthur and Walter!" Undoubtedly the old woman saw them, but her auditors beheld only a mildewed wall. Then Aunt Abbie, out of sheer nervousness, laughed.

The old woman went into an ecstacy of abuse. "Get out of my house! Get out! The two of you!" she screamed. And when Margaret sought to protect Aunt Abbie the old crone shoved Our Mutual Girl violently from the door.

THE HIDDEN MESSAGE (Nov. 18).—Bronson, a wealthy rancher, is hated by some Mexicans who, in revenge, kidnap his daughter, May, and hold her for ransom. They force May to write her father at their dictation that she will be killed unless he meets the abductors at a certain place by midnight and hands over to them a considerable sum of money. In a moment when her captors happen to be off guard May manages to write in very small, faint letters the address of the house where she is held, and the word, "Help!" in one corner of the envelope. Over this they carelessly stick the stamp, and Bronson on receiving the letter, tears off the envelope and lets it slip to the floor while he devours its appaling contents. He is at the home of the sheriff at the time, and the sheriff's child, playing on the floor, gets hold of the envelope and drops it into a pail of water. The stamp soaks off and the sheriff finds May's message. He heads a run to the rescue, prevents Bronson from paying the bribe, delivers the girl and arrests the Mexicans.

THEY NEVER KNEW (Nov. 25).—Ben Wilson takes a vacation on his father's farm and again meets Rose Meadows, the sweetheart of his boyhood. Prospects of an early marriage are bright till a family quarrel parts the lovers and Ben returns to the city to seek solace in wild conduct.

One night he visits a roadhouse to which Rose has been lured by Carrol Walker, a rake of the worst type. After a stirring fist fight Ben rescues the girl from a trying situation and starts to escort her safely back to the farm. As they near home the next morning she remembers the note she left behind to the effect that she had gone to marry the man she loved, and, ashamed to face her parents, refuses to go farther. Ben, however, convinces her that he is that very person and no time is lost in reaching the nearest parsonage.

Not having known of Carrol, Rose's father and mother gather from the note that she has gone to Ben. In consequence the two families are reconciled. From the returning couple their parents learn of the marriage. Of the other unfortunate affair they never knew.

THE HOP SMUGGLERS (Nov. 27).—Helen, a writer, tries to secure a position on a newspaper in order to earn necessary luxuries for her invalid mother. Refused a job unless she brings in a real news story, Helen dejectedly sallies forth on a still hunt for opium smugglers then operating successfully on the Mexican border. Sikes, the Revenue Officer, has been unable to get any evidence of any one.

Helen befriends a denizen of Chinatown and through him learns that the smuggling is being done through the means of an irrigation canal running across the border just outside the city. The smugglers fasten tins of opium to logs and

One of the logs gets caught in a chunk of wood and Helen finds it. With Sikes she lies in wait, captures the wood seller and drives the load of wood and opium to the restaurant, with Sikes hidden under the load of kindling. One of the smugglers has escaped and warns the restaurant by phone of the arrest of his pal, and a fight commences when Helen starts to unload the wood; but with the help of Sikes and a load of cops, the smugglers are captured with all the evidence.

Helen gets an exclusive story for the paper and is handed a job as news reporter.

THE MAN WITH THE HOE (Nov. 15).—Studying together the painting, "The Man With the Hoe," Richard West and his fiancee, Marion Gale, get into a dispute about the worth of the common laborer. Marion tells West that his attitude is snobbish. He tells her that she is entirely too "highbrow" and a coolness develops between the lovers which is not helped any by Marion's becoming friendly with the gardener on her father's place. Several days later she receives a note from the gardener telling her that his wife is very ill. Hurrying to their cottage, she is seen by West who is ignorant of the fact that the gardener is married. On her return he waylays her, upbraiding her in a fashion which really is insulting. The girl indignantly gives him back his engagement ring and leaves him. Not long after West disposes of a farm which is badly run down, and the gardener buys it. Soon the land is in a fine state of cultivation again and Marion becomes a guest there. West, broken in health, boards with the gardener and his wife. Believing that exercise will help him, he works with a hoe in the field. Here Marion sees him; and when, soon after, they meet, she finds that her lover has learned his lesson.

PAWNS OF FATE (Two Parts—Nov. 17).—After the new governor takes office, he is urged by the politicians of his party to dismiss from supporters of the defeated organization from office but he retains in office those who have demonstrated their fitness. One of the fortunate office holders is an old chief clerk who has been in the service of the State for many years. Both he and his daughter are very grateful to the governor for his kindness.

The governor has two beautiful daughters, twins, to whom he and his wife are greatly devoted. The children, through the treachery of their nurse, fall into the hands of a band of thieves and a message is sent to the governor that unless he pardons a criminal, awaiting execution, he will never see his children again. Drawn between love for his children and his duty to the State he is unable to make a decision, when a telephone bell rings and he is told that his girls have been rescued by the daughter of the old clerk and her fiancee, a young police officer.

His girls safely restored to him, the governor learns of the great danger which the brave girl and her sweetheart faced in rescuing the children, and he realizes more than ever that a little act of official kindness towards an old servant of the State has resulted in restoring his little girls to him.

A MESSENGER OF GLADNESS (Nov. 22).—Thanksgiving Day means much to the average American, and the importance of the occasion and the good feeling which should prevail was carefully explained to little Helen by her parents. The child was kind hearted and also very observing, and that was why she considered it necessary to become a little missionary.

She took a walk on Thanksgiving morning, and the child, in her innocence, wrought good in the lives of several people, soothing their troubles and causing hate to vanish at her disarming little smile and the request, "Please be fwiends, 'cause it's Fanksgiving." Men may grow harsh and women hardened, but the power of a little child is very great, and "the messenger of gladness" returned to her home and a splendid Thanksgiving dinner, a missionary for good in truth.

MRS. VAN RUYTER'S STRATEGEM (Two Parts—Nov. 24).—Mrs. Van Ruyter, a wealthy widow, entertained ideas and doubts as to the relatives who might inherit her fortune. They all lived in distant states and had never met her, so upon advice from her lawyer, she changed places with her housekeeper, and when her relatives arrived, they lavished great attentions upon the housekeeper, and made Mrs. Van Ruyter feel her position keenly.

The young lawyer, a widower with a little child of five, visits a toy factory and there the child, playing around the machinery, escapes serious injury through the courage of Ruth, a girl employed in the factory. Taking pity upon the girl, and admiring her for her courage, the lawyer persuades Mrs. Van Ruyter to give her a position as maid in her house, although Ruth believes that Mrs. Van Ruyter is merely the housekeeper as she represents herself to be.

Grace, a niece of Mrs. Van Ruyter's, is determined to become the heiress to the beautiful home and also to win Harry, the young lawyer, for her husband. In spite of this Harry's regard for Ruth grows stronger much to Ethel's anger. Ethel, noticing the attraction which Ruth has created in James, the butler, succeeds in arousing his jealousy so that he carries out a plot tending to discredit Ruth and secure her dismissal from the house. Mrs. Van Ruyter chances to over-hear the plot and determines to let it go through so as to learn whether Harry really cares for Ruth.

The plot apparently succeeds and Ruth is denounced a thief, when to everyone's surprise, Harry announces his determination to make Ruth his wife. Then, while the amazed relatives are trying to recover their surprise and dismay, "the housekeeper" springs another one and, revealing her real identity, announces that Ruth is innocent and charges the butler with having plotted out the whole affair to have Ruth dismissed. The butler discharged, and the relatives out of the house, Mrs. Van Ruyter informs Harry that in her new will Ruth will be her heiress, much to the chagrin and disgust of her relatives, and Ruth and Harry prove very loving children to the old lady.

A DENVER ROMANCE (Nov. 29).—She was a Western girl just out of finishing school going back to her father's big ranch near Denver. He was a young New York bachelor going West to see a little of his own country. He saved her from the unwelcome attentions of a masher in the station, and is it any wonder that they become deeply interested in each other during the long railroad journey westward? Her father was a product of the old west with a contempt for people from the East, whom he considered effeminate and lacking in manhood. But when his daughter pleaded so hard he considered her request and invited her new-found acquaintance to visit them at their big ranch during his stay in Denver. During the young bachelor's visit, their train acquaintance ripens into love, and though he gains the girl's consent, her father ordered him off from the ranch. She made a quick decision and ran out and intercepted the young easterner, and together they drove to the town hall and were married by the Mayor of Denver. When they went back for forgiveness, the young easterner carried in his vestpocket a small but ugly automatic gun, and, though father was ready with a big six-shooter, the young easterner managed to get the drop on father and convince him that the East as well as the West breeds sturdy, self-reliant manhood. So father yielded, under the circumstances, and grew to respect his young son-in-law, much to the delight of his daughter.

KOMIC.

A CORNER IN HATS (Nov. 29).—Henry has a terrible temper and is a perpetual grouch. One day Henry's wife buys a little dog for a companion, but she is afraid to let Henry know of her purchase for fear he will kick the dog out. So, whenever Henry comes home, she hides the dog. One day Henry comes home earlier than usual. He stops outside his parlor door and listens, for he hears his wife talking "baby-talk" to someone inside. Of course Henry thinks that she is talking to a man. He bursts the door in, but his wife has time to put the dog out the window before he can see it. Henry accuses her of unfaithfulness but she swears on the Bible that she has had no one with her. Arguing the matter, they both walk out of the parlor.

Now Henry's wife's dog is quite a connoiseur and collector of hats. When his mistress puts him out of the window he runs down the street, steals the hat of a neighbor gentleman named Murphy, runs back home, jumps in the window and deposits the hat on the middle of the rug in the parlor. Then he jumps out the window again. Presently Henry and his wife come back to the parlor, still arguing. The first thing that Henry sees is Murphy's hat. Grabbing his hat he starts out after Murphy. Henry goes to Murphy and asks him in a gentle manner if that is his hat. Murphy says yes. Henry jumps on his neck and licks him. Then, his honor vindicated, Henry starts for home.

But Henry's wife's dog has not been idle in the meantime and when Henry arrives home he goes into the parlor and finds a couple more hats on the rug. Henry is exhausted but his fighting blood is up. He grabs the hats of his other two rivals and starts out looking for their owners. He finds the two of them, and, as they are neither very big, he licks both of them at once. Then Henry starts home once more.

In the meantime Henry's wife's dog has found a harvest of hats in the ante-room of the police station and when Henry gets back home this time he finds the parlor full of policemen's hats and thinks that his wife has been receiving the whole force. Henry gets a bomb and starts for the police station. The police are quietly playing pinocle. Henry blows up the station, entirely ruining the game. Then Henry starts to run home and kill his guilty wife while the police pull themselves together and start after him. Henry breaks into the parlor and finds a stack of hats there that nearly reaches to the ceiling. He hunts up his wife, drags her into the parlor by her hair and tells her to prepare to die. He grabs out a knife and starts to sharpen it on his shoe. Every now and then he grabs a hair out of his wife's head and cuts it with the knife to see if it is sharp enough. All this time the police are on their way. Just as Henry is ready to do the foul deed the police break in and take him into custody. At this moment the dog runs in with another hat and Henry is lead away by the police.

THE CROSS IN THE DESERT (Two Parts—Nov. 25).—Sam Higgins, a grocery clerk, sends his invalid wife, her mother and baby to Arizona for his wife's health. The cottage rented by them is owned by John Hecker, a railroad superintendent. They cannot pay the rent Hecker tells them they must pay or get out. They write to Sam, asking him to come on and get a job there and take care of them. The husband is unable to go for want of money. Big Jim Dougherty, king of the hoboes, drifts into the store, tells Sam how he can reach Arizona by freight and gives him signs so that the hoboes on the road will help him.

Sam leaves about a month later, but owing to an order issued by the superintendent whereby all hoboes are ordered thrown from all trains, Sam is thrown off by a brakeman on the desert. Dougherty and the other tramps find him and bury him, placing a cross to mark the grave. Hecker is called out to fix a broken block signal and leaves for the scene on a handcar with a couple of men. The bum and Dougherty catch Hecker, dress him in Dougherty's clothes and send him to the railroad yards to try and get a ride under the new order. Hecker undertakes to do this and receives a dose of his own medicine; he is thrown off the train and later is found clinging to the cross erected by Dougherty. Dougherty finds a wad of money in Hecker's clothes. He goes to the home of the wife and throws the bills to the baby who is playing on the floor, with a note stating that the money will do them more good than the owner, and leaves. He later finds the skeleton of the superintendent clinging to the cross, a note pinned on it stating that if he had done to others as he would have them do to him he would not have died alone in the desert.

SHORTY FALLS INTO A TITLE (Two Parts—Nov. 18).—Shorty is in charge of the riders with Selby's Wild West Show in London, England. The cook in serving Shorty pours coffee into his hat, which has been substituted for his cup by one of the cowboys and not noticed by the cook. Shorty beats the cook up and throws him out of the tent. The cook, to get even, places a burr under the saddle of Shorty's horse. Selby's horse goes lame and he borrows Shorty's. The horse bucks him off during the performance and Selby thinks Shorty placed the burr under the saddle to put up a job on him. He fires Shorty.

Shorty while resting in the park meets Lord Chatham, whom the suffragettes have a spite against. Chatham persuades Shorty to change clothes with him and impersonate him for a while. Shorty takes his place in Lord Chatham's handsome house, where he makes all kinds of mistakes in etiquette, much to the disgust of the English servants. Shorty drinks too much champagne. While walking in the park he runs into a suffragette meeting. The women take him for Lord Chatham and commence to beat him up. Shorty runs, is pursued by the angry mob of women. He comes to the wharf, where the steamer is just leaving, and on which Selby and his Wild West Show are sailing for America. Shorty jumps off the end of the wharf, swims out to the boat and is pulled on board by Selby and the cowboys.

THE MASTER OF THE HOUSE (Two Parts—Nov. 20).—Guy Winston, owner of the Croesus Mines, leaves for the east to form a syndicate. Mr. Wayne, one of Guy's business associates, invites him to a dinner party at his home. There Guy meets and falls in love with Lois Herrington, a young society girl with a very ambitious mother and a parasite of a brother. Lois really likes and admires Guy, but feels herself above him. After the wedding she ignores Guy and she and her family use him as a good thing, and run up scandalous bills, which he pays without a word. After awhile, however, Guy becomes tired of his position in his own house and his pride and self-respect assert itself. He tells Lois he is leaving for the west to remain there permanently, and asks her how soon she can be ready to accompany him. She laughs at him. He demands that she remain at home that night and read to him. She refuses. He finally ties her into a chair where she remains from one evening until the next day at noon before she gives in. He finally conquers her, however, and her old love reasserts itself. As he is about to leave for the west, she comes to him and asks him if he thinks he will be able to find a house for them in the west. They are happily reconciled and decide to leave Lois' mother and brother in the east when they go west.

NIPPED (Two Parts—Nov. 19).—Nasso Nakado, a Japanese of high birth, is living on Magdalena Bay, Mexico, disguised as a fisherman. Taro Kamura, another distinguished subject of the Mikado, is sent as special envoy to arrange with General Gomez for land concessions. He and Nakado work together on the proposition and succeed in securing the promise of the land in return for arms and ammunition. In the meantime, San Toy, Nakado's beautiful daughter, secretly has been posing for an American artist, Tom Wright, with whom she has fallen in love. He learns through her the secrets of the Japanese. Turo Kamura meets San Toy and wishes to marry her. She rejects him, however, and one day he follows her to the American's tent. Wright sees the Mikado's envoys at night unloading a ship filled with ammunition and rifles, which they store in the Japanese Christian mission. He enlists the help of Bill Davis, another American, and with the co-operation of some miners they blow up the mission. Kamura tells Nakado and the Mexican general to look for the spy in Wright's tent. Meanwhile the young American has made his escape. But San Toy, returning to warn him, is shot and killed by Gomez who mistakes her for Wright. Kamura displays to Nakado the artist's painting of San Toy and says, "It is just. Your daughter was a traitor to her country."

THANHOUSER SYNDICATE CORP.

ZUDORA (Episode No. 1—The Mystic Message of the Spotted Collar).—Zudora is eighteen years old. Her guardian, Hassam Ali, is a disciple of Hindu mysticism, and not quite accustomed to his present affluence. When Zudora was a baby Hassam Ali was a fakir with a small caravan circus in the far West. Zudora's mother was his sister and the rope walker in the same show. Zudora's father did not travel with the show, but remained in a small mining town where he prospected for gold. At the time the story opens Zudora has been born and the circus with the baby, her mother and Hassam Ali, her uncle, are revisiting the town of Zudora's birth and where Zudora's father is still prospecting. Events happen quickly on that day. Zudora's father finds that the Zudora mine, after which the baby was named, yields a wonderful run of gold, and in his exultation he becomes over-zealous and is killed in an explosion of a blasting charge. In his dying breath he wills the entire mine, which is valued at $20,000,000, to Zudora, the mine becoming her property when she reaches her eighteenth birthday, and in the event of Zudora's death, going to the nearest heir-at-law.

Zudora's mother receives information of her husband's death at a time when she is about to ascend the rope and give her performance. The news naturally startles her, she falls to the ground, and with a dying gasp turns over to Hassam Ali, her brother, the guardianship of Zudora. The story then carries along to the time when Zudora has reached her eighteenth year. Hassam Ali has set himself up as a mystic, but his one purpose in life is to rid himself of Zudora, so that the Zudora mine will come to him—the only remaining heir. He is also anxious to rid himself of John Storm, Zudora's sweetheart.

Also, strangely, he has kept from Zudora the information that upon her eighteenth birthday she will be the possessor of great wealth. He at last arrives at one plan that seems safe. Zudora has evidenced quite wonderful powers herself in deduction and detective intelligence. He knows this will be a good chance for him, so he tells her that since she has always been so anxious to incorporate herself in his work, he will give her the next twenty cases he is called upon to solve. He says to her: "If you win, you may marry John Storm—if you lose on any one of them, you renounce him forever."

It is about this time then that Zudora's sweetheart is involved in a great case for the city. Opposed to him is one Bienreith, a prominent lawyer. The case is going well for John Storm. It is really after Storm has left the courtroom amid the applause of the crowded galleries and comes to Zudora's side with a newspaper in his hand, telling of his plans, that Hassam Ali, watching near the two young people, decides that after eighteen years of waiting there has at last come a time when he can use heroic measures. He denounces Storm in front of Zudora, and then tells her about the twenty cases. The very first thing in the courtroom, Storm slaps the face of Bienreith, after a particularly insulting speech, and is invited to a duel that night by his infuriated opponent. He says as he slips the paper across the attorney's table, "Meet me this night at midnight—one only of us shall survive." At that, Zudora would have heard nothing of her sweetheart's dilemma had not a reporter watching near waited until the courtroom was clear and then grabbed the telltale paper. An hour later the newspapers are full. Zudora reads of her sweetheart's trouble, rushes to his side, and finds him in the basement of his home practicing with a revolver.

On the way to his house, she had formulated a plan. If it is within her power she will keep him from meeting Bienreith. She purchases a drug, and as Storm tries his skill with a revolver she drops the drug in a glass of drinking water and leaves.

LOS ANGELES ADDRESS: 514 WEST 8th STREET

Next morning the papers tell of Storm's disappearance. He had not met in duel with Bienreith, but the great mystery of it all is that Bienreith has been found dead in his room and the blame placed upon John Storm. About 10 o'clock that morning Storm is seen wandering along the Battery front. He is arrested. Zudora, realizing quickly that something is wrong, rushes to her uncle (Hassam Ali) and begs that this be her first case, and thus we are ushered into our first labor for her.

When she goes to Bienreith's home that morning she gathers up, among other effects from the dead man's room, the collar that he had worn when killed.

It has queer markings upon it, lead pencil lines running up and down. She takes a microscope and studies the lines carefully, but can make no headway for some time. She is nearly frantic and at her wits end when Storm is brought into court and formally charged with the murder. She reaches the courtroom just in time to say, "Stop, he is not guilty—I—I—," as she falls into a faint. Hassam Ali and one Burns, a confederate, are watching as the girl, recovering, begins to explain that she has solved the mystery. Burns is placing a revolver, equipped with a Maxim silencer against her neck, when she turns suddenly and takes a pencil from his vest pocket to prove her contention to the hundreds of people in the courtroom.

She suddenly realizes, in looking at the mark, that there is a strange similarity between the markings of Burns' pencil and the markings on the collar. Court is adjourned. Zudora manages to induce Burns to accompany her home, where she leads him to the mystic room, and there by a series of lights that Hassam Ali has used so hypnotizes Burns that he confesses to killing Bienreith and describes the manner of it. Zudora had placed two lawyers, one for the defendant and one for the state, behind the black velvet curtains and they hear the confession.

Hassam Ali is hiding behind a great crystal globe with a revolver in his hand determined to kill Burns should the real secret be given to Zudora. Burns, however, is so infuriated by the revolving lights that at the last of his confession he grabs them and there is a bolt of electricity, which crosses him and he is killed. Zudora has solved her first case and Hassam Ali congratulates her. The confession is detailed to the court by the two lawyers who heard it and Zudora clasps Storm in her arms as the judge proclaims him free.

ECLECTIC.

THE QUEST OF THE SACRED GEM (Four Parts).—David Harding visits in his wanderings an old friend in the city of Barrnipore. He hears of a religious festival to be held in the Temple that night and of a wonderful diamond of incalcuable value which is set in the forehead of the stone god of the Temple. He determines to risk a visit to the Temple and, disguising himself as a native, mingles among the worshippers undetected. His cupidity is aroused by the gem and in the night, when the throng has left the Temple, he pries out the jewel and attempts to escape with it. A Hindoo fakir near by gives the alarm and Harding breaks away from the quick gathering crowd with difficulty. He barely has time to reach his rooms, remove his disguise and leave the house before the angry natives are at the door.

Sobered by his peril he at once leaves for America, ignorant of the fact that he is followed by the Hindoo priest and his assistants. In New York on a railroad train the natives manage to reach him as he lies in his berth and kill him. One of them falls from the train while they are doing this and plunges to his death below. The survivors fail to find the jewel. When Harding's will is read it is found that he has left all his property, including the jewel, to his niece, May Rowland. Among the first to congratulate the girl is Joe Marsden, her fiance.

May gives a party to celebrate the announcement of her engagement. While the party is happily occupied in the music room it is announced that Hindoo jugglers are outside. Joe goes outside and at once the priest, who is disguised as a juggler, exerts his powers of hypnotism over him. The rest of the party come to the door just in time to break the charm. That night the Hindoos come near the house and again the priest calls his powers into play. Joe feels the mysterious influence, rises in his slumbers and directed by the Hindoo's will, enters May's dressing room and takes the jewel from the drawer where it is hidden. As he comes from her room he is watched by a young man, who is a fellow guest, and who is badly in need of money. The jewel falls from Joe's grasp and is seized and hidden by the other man. In the meantime May has heard Joe's entrance into her room and has seen him take the jewel. Because of his supposed theft, May breaks her engagement with him. A celebrated detective is called in upon the case and with the assistance of his office boy, succeeds in unravelling the mystery, but not before a number of exciting events have occurred. The Hindoo priest succeeds in getting possession of the jewel and taking it back to his native land. The girl and her lover are reunited, and the jewel and the curse of its ownership forgotten.

MAX IN A DIFFICULT POSITION.—Our friend Max has a new kind of experience in this rib-fracturing comedy. Invited out to dine by the girl of his choice and dressed in his best, he discovers to his horror that he has a large rip in the seat of his trousers. He performs a hasty "first aid to the injured" with a needle and thread and leaves for his sweetheart's house, confident that all is well.

While talking vivaciously to the other guests he hears, to his horror, an ominous rip. As they talk into the dining room Max carries along a chair as a "rear guard." While he is not looking it is removed and poor Max has to use a servant's tray to take its place. While they are dancing he seizes his charmer's fan and makes that serve as a screen.

WHIFFLE'S NIGHTMARE.—Here Whiffles takes a double part—he plays two brothers—the rich and stingy one as well as the impecunious, money seeking one. Some remarkable feats of double exposure are shown, and there is plenty of humor besides. The rich man is taught a lesson by his needy brother when he refuses to loan him money. By pretence of suicide the poor man is able to get the financial help he desires.

CUPID'S PRANKS.—Ruth's mother likes Mr. Todilike, who is a regular sissie and is abhorred by the charming girl. Ruth's father likes Mr. Colefeat, who is cold, sombre and austere enough to effectually kill any chance of the girls ever liking him. Each parent insists upon the daughter marrying the man of their individual choice, and the girl will have neither, preferring a husky and very masculine young man who wants her as much as she wants him.

Aided by mother, Todilike courts the girl vigorously and in his own fashion. His impassioned pleas are cut short by the arrival of his rival, backed by the stern personality of father. A miniature war develops between the separate suitors' parties with Ruth in the position of the innocent neutral who desires nothing so much as peace, but who is the battle ground of both parties and goes as the prize to the conqueror.

While the battle is at its height, enters Jack, whom the girl favors. Seizing the girl they rush from the house to the waiting auto. Unfortunately, the auto refuses to be easily cranked, and before they can get fully under way they are boarded by father and mother, as well as the two suitors. Jack is nothing if not fertile in expedients. He turns on the "gas," the auto goes faster and faster. Turning a corner on one wheel, he loses one of the suitors, who has been hanging on precariously. Another corner disposes of another. Seeing the fate of their allies, father and mother soon come to terms with Jack, and the prize is his.

GEORGE KLEINE.

JULIUS CAESAR (Six Parts).—Before reaching his twentieth birthday, Caesar meets and falls madly in love with pretty Cornelia, daughter of Lucius Cinna. They are soon married despite the advice of their friends, who well know the bitter animosity existing between Sulla, dictator of Rome, and Lucius Cinna. The immediate result of this hasty marriage is an annulment and the banishment from Rome of Caesar. He leaves, vowing that the eternal city shall again hear of him.

This does not occur until twenty years later, when he returns at news of Sulla's death and plunges briskly into the campaign for the consulship. In this he is aided by Calpurnia, daughter of the wealthy Piso. Caesar and Calpurnia are married and Caesar is elected to the consulship in the face of strong opposition by Cato, the younger, who fears the growing popularity of the still youthful statesman. To further fortify himself against the attacks of Cato, Caesar forms a political alliance with Pompey, which later grows into the first triumvirate consisting of Caesar, Pompey and Crassus. Caesar then gives his daughter Julia, by his first wife Cornelia, in marriage to Pompey and turns his restless ambition to greater fields.

News that he will set out with an expeditionary force into Western Europe brings a strong protest from the Gauls. One day a beautiful Druidess visits Caesar and attempts to end his life, thwarted only by the ever-watchful, loving eye of Calpurnia. Not in the least daunted, Caesar pushes his campaign into Gaul with characteristic vigor, sweeps to destruction the formidable tribes headed by Vercingetorix in a series of the most brilliant battles recorded in history, and returns triumphant to Rome.

Meanwhile, Pompey grows jealous of the conqueror's ever increasing power and stirs up the senate against him, citing the Roman law that no man may become proconsul and retain military command. Marc Antony warns Caesar, at Revenna, of what he may expect in Rome while Marcus Brutus, nephew of Cato, visits Caesar with the senate's dictum. And Caesar, placing the matter squarely before his soldiers and receiving their answer, "Without Caesar there is no Rome," orders his troops across the Rubicon. The senate declares him a traitor, but the populace hails him with acclaim and ceremony.

Then the struggle for the mastery of the world begins. Caesar robs the Temple of Saturn to secure money for his troops and pursues Pompey to Pharsalus, where a desperate battle takes place, resulting in the annihiliation of Pompey's army and the flight of its leader into Egypt. Back to Rome goes victorious Caesar to fight no more and to be made Dictator for life!

In 44 B. C., Julius Caesar, now fifty-six years of age, settles down to the administration of justice with a temperance and wisdom mellowed by age and experience. But his old enemy, Cato, intent upon the Dictator's destruction, hatches a conspiracy in which he and Brutus are the ringleaders. When veiled rumors of this reach Caesar he refuses to affront the dignity of the senate with armed guards and one day permits the opening, long watched for by the conspirators. Brutus touches him upon the shoulder and the next second a knife flashes in the air. Caesar reels, the target of a dozen blows, "And thou, too, Brutus? Then fall Caesar!"

Pandemonium reigns! The city is aflame with riot and murder. Marc Antony, concluding his oration in the market place, smiles, "Mischief, thou are afoot—take thou what course thou wilt!"

FOR HOME AND COUNTRY (Two Parts—Nov.).—Lieutenant Ashby, of the Flying Corps, is at home in Belcroft village. He is in love with Ruth Pendleton, the Vicar's daughter. On the day that he receives orders to report at Framborough for manoeuvres comes word that the home army and fleet, which are at war in the Orient, have had a serious reverse, and that there is little likelihood of the fleet returning for some time. Before going off to duty, Ashby proposes to Ruth, and the two go together to obtain her father's consent. Although the Vicar likes Ashby, he is opposed to him as a son-in-law for the simple reason that he does not believe that war is right—and Ashby's calling is warlike. And so Pendleton vetoes the engagement, and, with a tender farewell to Ruth, Ashby goes off to obey the summons to arms.

During domestic difficulties a foreign power sees a chance for invading the home country. The foreign war office is informed by its Secret Service that the only spot on the coast where a good landing can be secured for horses and troops is at Belcroft. All the plans are secretly completed, and the invading fleet sets off. On the home shores, the spies of the foreign power attack the coast guard and on the East coast shoot the guards, and destroy the wireless apparatus. After signalling to the oncoming fleet that the way is clear, they depart. One of the guards revives sufficiently to send a broken message of warning to the Postmaster at Belcroft by the undamaged telegraph instrument which has been overlooked by the spies.

Lieutenant Ashby gets the unfinished news and promptly telephones to the war office, where preparations are at once made for calling out the whole of the militia army and the volunteers. Captain Forrest, the leader of the local militia company hastily assembles his men, and they set off to repulse the invaders.

The enemy land and the Vicarage at Belcroft is chosen for headquarters. A detachment arrives, and Pendleton and Ruth are rudely disturbed. Insulting behavior on the part of the foreigners towards Ruth goads Pendleton to snatch a revolver from the holster of one of the foreign officers and make a fight for it. In the midst of a desperate melee, Pendleton, holding the landing at the top of the Vicarage staircase against the enemy, the local militia company comes upon the scene, and the attacking enemy find themselves quickly overpowered. With the local militia company comes Ashby, who is told off to take Pendleton and Ruth to a place of safety. In the meantime, the foreigners commence savage tactics in Belcroft village, leaving a trial of corpses and blazing ruins behind them, and Pendleton, righteously angry, declares that if this is the sort of enemy England has to fight, he wants to fight also. Arrived at Chesterton he enlists for active service, Ruth also offering her services as a nurse.

At the headquarters at Chesterton Lieutenant Ashby secures valuable information from his aeroplane. In the subsequent war council held in General Neville's tent the shadow of a listening spy is cast on the tent walls by the camp fire outside. The spy is shot, and the papers found on him enable the General to checkmate the enemy's contemplated moves. On the second day of the battle, while Pendleton is tending to a dying man, he is badly wounded in the arm by a stray bullet. Finally, after hot fighting, the invaders are routed, and are compelled to retreat in disorder to the coast.

In the end of the story we see Ashby, the Rev. John Pendleton and his daughter, Ruth, meeting once more at the Vicarage after the war. This time the Vicar has no objections to the marriage between Ruth and Ashby, for he has discovered a new significance in the Biblical assertion that "The Lord is a Man of War."

THE WOMAN HE WRONGED (Four Parts).—Refusing to give his consent to the marriage of his son, Count George, to Helen Holt, a poor miller's daughter, Baron Rothschild orders his son to Paris at once. Some time later a child is born to Helen Holt, and the Baron, promising to provide for it, persuades the miller to have someone adopt it, and tell the mother that it died immediately after birth. Count George forgetting his old love, receives his father's consent to marry Princess Louise Turner. A year later, the Baron having died, the Count and his wife return to take possession of the estate.

On the verge of war, two spies, Lieutenant Berloff and Captain Klink, are instructed to leave Paris at once for the enemy's country. Arriving at their destination, Captain Klink secures lodgings with the fisherman, Larson, and Lieutenant Berloff, posing as an artist, finds the old mill well suited to his plans and they immediately set to work to bring the mill and the fisherman's home into telegraphic communication, and extend the wires to an abandoned vessel, in which they have stored a quantity of explosives.

The Countess, out riding one day, meets Lieutenant Berloff and recognizes him as one of the most ardent admirers before her marriage. They hold clandestine meetings, and one day, while in the mill, the ticking of the telegraph instrument puts Lieutenant Berloff in a dilemma, and he confesses to the Countess that he is a spy. In loyalty to her country she promises to help him. Disguised as a gypsy she secures the plans of the enemy's movements from Capt. Berry, whom she has drugged, and takes them to Lieutenant Berloff.

Helen, the miller's daughter, overhears the spy informing his confederate of the enemy's movements, and notifies Captain Berry. Berry, arriving at the Countess' home, fires at what he believes to be the Countess' figure, but which turns out to be her reflection in the mirror, behind which is a secret vault. The Count, arriving home, sees the vault open, and finds a letter addressed to him in which his father confesses that the child of Helen Holt still lives and is adopted by John Larson, the fisherman. The Count and Helen immediately set out to claim their child.

Berry, on his way to the mill, meets the Countess and Berloff. Following them, they take refuge in the ship. Proving their rights to the child, the Count and Helen return to the mill, where the child accidentally pulls the lever which causes the explosion of the ship. The miller, in the excitement, overturns a candle which sets fire to the mill. After a miraculous escape, the Count returns to his home, where he is informed by Capt. Berry that the Countess was found on the beach dead. All obstacles removed, Helen and the Count are married.

RIP VAN WINKLE (Five Parts).—Mr. Jefferson reads the book of Rip Van Winkle. Rip Van Winkle appears to him in a reverie as an idle young fellow, whose wife labors at the wash tub to make a scanty livelihood for their daughter Meenie and herself. Rip spent all the money he obtained in mortgaging his property to Derrick von Beekman, the wealthy money lender of the village of Fallen Waters, who has taken all of Rip's lands. The property was only mortgaged, but if it were sold to pay off this mortgage, it would sell for more than enough to pay off the loan on the land, and the balance would revert to Rip Van Winkle.

Derrick von Beekman, being notified of this by his counsellor, tries to get Rip to sign away all claims on the mortgages. To induce Rip to do this, he voluntarily lends him sixteen pounds to be paid twenty years from date, without interest. Rip is persuaded by von Beekman to accept the money and starts anew by standing treat to the whole village. Von Beekman tries to get Rip to sign away all his claims, but Rip places the document in his game bag and decides to think it over. Then he goes home to face his wife, Gretchen, and tries to make up for staying out all night in the mountains. He finds no one at home but the children. They come to him and ask him to make a boat for them. He does so. Having no sail to the boat, he thinks of the paper in his game bag, and places it on the mast. While sailing it in the tub, little Heinrich Vedder, son of Nick Vedder, the innkeeper, tells Rip there is writing on it. Rip reads the letter that Derrick von Beekman is trying to get him to sign, and finds out why Derrick was in such a hurry.

Rip later attends a dance. Amid the frivolities, Gretchen, Rip's wife, catches him embracing one of the girls. She chases him through the house with a club, throwing chairs at him, and Rip and his dog, Schneider, make their exit and take to the mountains.

A storm comes up in which little Meenie and little Heinrich are afraid of lightning. Heinrich tells Meenie the cause of the lightning, saying that Henderick Hudson and his crew, who live in the mountains, produce the lightning and thunder by playing ten pins and Henderick Hudson lighting his pipe. Rip, who is in the storm, returns home and, as his custom is, he throws his hat in the window, the children try to warn Rip that Gretchen is hiding, but he is caught by the ear and dragged into the house. Gretchen, while scolding him, takes from his game bag a flask of whiskey, which she puts in her pocket. Rip, in turn, steals the bottle from her apron. He swears that he will never drink again. Gretchen, pleased, goes to Meenie and tells her that her father has sworn off, but returns only to find that Rip has lied to her and is drinking the liquor. She takes the bottle from him, throws it out of the window, and demands that Rip leave the house never to return again.

He and his dog, Schneider, go to the mountains. After long climbing, he misses his bottle and sends Schneider for it. Schneider returns to the house, finds Rip's bottle and brings it to him. Rip rewards Schneider by giving him the only crust of bread left in the game bag. Schneider becomes afraid of something and deserts Rip. Rip, looking for the cause of Schneider's fear, turns and sees a strange little being carrying a keg, clambering up the mountain side, who comes to him and in dumb language asks him to carry the keg up the mountain. Rip agrees to carry this for the strange being. Arriving at the home of Henderick Hudson, Rip is induced to drink of the strange liquor in the keg, and falls into a long sleep which lasts for twenty years.

Rip, thought to have been lost in the mountains and died, von Beekman importunes Rip's wife, who is now in poverty. Meenie, now a grown girl, is pursued by his nephew, Cockles, who insults her. Young Henderick Vedder avenges the insult, by knocking Cockles down. Nick Vedder, now old and feeble, realizing that the end is near, betrothes Meenie and Henderick. Von Beekman, at the punishment of his nephew, tells Gretchen that he is going to turn Nick Vedder and his family into the street. He goes to the Inn, but is stopped from entering by Meenie, who tells him that Nick has passed away.

Henderick, who cannot make the Inn pay, decides to go with his uncle on a whaling voyage. He leaves Meenie heartbroken, and departs on the whaling boat. After a time the ship is wrecked and Henderick is cast on an island from which he is eventually rescued. Von Beekman and Cockles force themselves on Meenie and Gretchen. Gretchen finally decides to marry von Beekman to gain wealth. Upon hearing the news of Henderick's death, she is fatally stricken. Time passes and Rip is still in slumberland. Cockles, still anxious to marry Meenie, urges his uncle to force her into marriage. Meanwhile Henderick thinks that his child sweetheart is still waiting for him.

Rip has now awakened from his slumber and finds everything changed. He cannot realize that he has been asleep but for one night. He returns to the village of Fallen Waters. On making inquiries, he is told that Meenie is to be married to Cockles. When he explains that he is Rip Van Winkle, he is looked upon as a crazy hermit. The wedding is about to take place. Henderick returns in time to prevent the marriage. Knocking Cockles down, he seizes Meenie and rushes from the church. On the way home they see an old man. Having compassion on him, they hurry him home. He realizes where he is and explains that he once had a little girl Meenie, and that he is Rip Van Winkle. Meenie tells him that she is Meenie Van Winkle and that her father went away twenty years ago and never returned. Rip looks into her face and recognizes his daughter. In the meantime, the people from the church have come to the house and attempt to come in. Henderick holds them back, but Rip, remembering the paper von Beekman wanted him to sign, tells Henderick to let him in. The paper proves that the property belongs to Rip. Cockles and Derrick both realize that they have lost everything, as Rip orders them from the house. The crowd, learning that Derrick has caused Rip's trouble, stone the two villains from the village. Meenie offers her father a stimulant, but he refuses at first but finally consents to drink his famous toast:

"Here's to your health and your family; may they live long and prosper."

The scene fades from this happy reunion to Mr. Jefferson finishing the works of his beloved father.

THE CHARLOTTE STREET MYSTERY (Three Parts).—Davidoff, an adventurer, and Kate Meredith, his clever associate, notice at an auction sale a valuable jeweled ornament which they wish to obtain possession of. The ornament is purchased by the Count and Countess Warden, and when the former presents his card to the auctioneer Davidoff notes the name and address. Then they devise a clever scheme by which to obtain the jewels. First Kate secures a position as nurse to the children of Detective Barker, hoping to thus divert suspicion from herself.

Davidoff calls upon the countess, telling her that a friend of his has an ornament exactly similar to the one she purchased at the sale, and that he thinks the friend would sell it if the Countess desired it. Being a collector of valuable jewels, she was interested in the other ornament, and asked for the address of the owner, so Davidoff gives her Kate Meredith's address. He then tells the Countess he would like to see the ornament she purchased, and when she gets it he notes where she keeps it.

Davidoff then hurries to inform Kate to be ready for the Countess' visit. They have rented a room in the house next door to Detective Barker's, securing a room on the same floor as Kate's room in the Barker house, and they have cut a secret passage between the two rooms, which they conceal by placing wardrobes in front of it. When the Countess calls upon Kate, the latter contrives to have her handle some needle-work, in which a needle has been concealed. The needle pierces the Countess' finger and she becomes unconscious, the needle having been in contact with a drug.

Kate puts on the Countess' hat, veil and coat and rushes to the latter's home, Davidoff having told her where the jewels are kept. Fooled by her disguise, the servants think she is the Countess and admit her. She succeeds in stealing the jewels unobserved and returns to her room just before the Countess recovers. She sets the Countess' watch back one hour in order that the latter will not know how long she has been there. When the Countess arrives home she discovers that the jewels are missing, and notifies Detective Barker. The latter finds a single blonde hair in the Countess' watch and after she tells him of her visit to Kate's room he immediately goes there himself. He falls into the same trap which caught the Countess, sticking himself with the needle, and falls into a stupor. Kate comes through the secret passage and rolls him through a trap door. He rolls down a slanting roof but is caught by a small rail at the edge, preventing his falling to the ground. Upon recovering he makes his way back to the room and discovers the needle, and the secret connection between the two rooms. He then knows that the thief is the nurse, and he finds that she has already fled. He discovers that she is a confederate of the famous criminal, Davidoff, so he immediately sets out to find the latter.

He traces them to an apartment just as they are leaving to flee the country. He captures them, but as he forces them to enter the elevator at the point of his revolver they prove too quick for him, starting the elevator suddenly, leaving the detective behind. The latter rushes down the steps, and not finding them at the bottom, thinks they have gotten away, so starts after them down the street. They, however, have hidden in the bottom of the car, and after the detective is out of sight get into a taxi and rush to the wharf just in time to catch a departing steamer. The detective sees them pass in a taxi and gives chase on a motorcycle that happens by. He arrives on the wharf too late to catch them but secures a motorboat, overtaking the steamer and surprises the fugitives, arresting them at last.

THE CRIMINAL CODE (Four Parts—Balboa).—Betty, an orphan girl of sixteen, is abused at an orphanage, and one evening after an unusually trying episode, she escapes. She rides a freight car to a distant city. There she wanders cold and hungry, and at last falls fainting in a park. Francis Seeman, a Raffles, driving by in his limousine, rescues her. He adopts and educates Betty. At the school she meets Gladys, the daughter of a wealthy man, and the girls become very good chums. At the end of the four years Betty returns to Seeman, and then he discloses his purpose in adopting her. She is horror-stricken, but forced by threats to follow instructions. He and Betty go to another city to begin their operations; Seeman forges a letter of introduction to one of the wealthiest men of the town, and thereby gains social recognition. He and Betty are invited to a fashionable function, Betty posing as Seeman's daughter. There she meets Gladys, her school chum and a niece of the hostess. Seeman forces Betty to steal the latter's diamond necklace. A few days later Gladys calls on Betty, and incidentally shows her a beautiful rope of pearls. Just as she is showing them to Betty, Seeman enters. After Gladys has gone, Seeman commands Betty to get the pearls. Betty refuses, and Seeman, enraged, tries to choke her. Betty, frightened, seizes a hat pin and stabs Seeman with it. He falls to the floor. She then goes to the safe and takes some money, and finds Mrs. Mills' necklace. Deliberately she takes the jewels and strews them across Seeman's body, so the public may know who stole them.

Betty retires to the country, posing as a widow, and takes a little cottage, as it happens next to the young clergyman, Roger Neville. She and Roger become very good friends, but the villagers disapprove. One day a little boy comes for Roger to go to the bedside of a dying woman. Betty goes along. The woman they find already dead, leaving a boy of four. Roger suggests one of the villagers adopt the orphan, but all the women answer that they already have too many mouths of their own to feed, and to send the child to the orphanage. The picture of what she had suffered at the orphanage rises before Betty, and she begs to take the boy. The villagers sniff and turn up their noses, declaring Betty did this only to make an impression.

In the meantime Seeman is taken to the hospital. He lies between life and death, held for the robberies. Seeman at last is on the road to recovery, and determined not to go to prison alone, he tells the detectives Betty is his accomplice, and gives them a picture of her. They begin their search. One day when the papers are delivered to the villagers, they see a picture of Betty on the front page, telling why she is wanted. The minister receives the paper, and reads the article. Upon his persuasion, Betty tells her story. In the meantime the detectives arrive, and the village people are only too eager to show them where Betty is. At the trial Betty tells her story to the judge and jury, and it wins her case, the judge giving Seeman a long term in the penitentiary. Gladys is at the trial, and shows her loyalty toward Betty.

THE WINNER (Three Parts—Nemo).—Jack Banks and Tex Reeves are friendly rivals for the hand of Bess Harper, daughter of a rancher and horse dealer. Jack is line rider on an outlying ranch. Tex is Harper's corral boss. Harper favors Tex's attentions to his daughter, regarding Jack a drunken loafer.

Jack protects a half-breed from a severe beating at the hands of Tex, during a dispute over a poker hand. The same evening in a drunken stupor, he loans his new boots to Tex to attend a dance. Tex, while saddling his horse, accidentally steps in the mud by the water trough, leaving a distinct impression of Jack's boot heels, which later gets that gentleman in bad. The following morning Jack's horse, after an impatient night of pawing at the hitch rail, enters the saloon, and by pulling off Jack's hat, dumping his whiskey bottle over, coaxes his master out and kneels for him to mount.

As he is about to ride away, the stage drives up. He waits for the mail, receives a letter from his mother, saying she is in poor health and in need of a little money. Ashamed of his prodigality and too proud to borrow from his friends, he sells his prize horse to Harper, and sends the proceeds home. That night the horse breaks out of Harper's corral and beats it for Jack's lonely cabin. Tex, aroused at the noise, rushes into the empty corral. The half-breed, who has been laying there for Tex, seeing an opportunity in the deserted corral for vengeance, takes a shot at Tex. Suspicion naturally points to Jack. Jack is captured and jailed. Tex slowly recovers, but the wound in his head has clouded his memory.

The half-breed, hearing of Jack's capture, induces Bess to help plan his escape. They accomplish a clever stunt, and Jack stays hidden in the back country for a month. Bess, at her father's instigation, has become engaged to Tex. Jack, while rustling grub one day, wanders too far from his hiding place, and is recaptured after a running fight by one of the deputies. The same day the mail brings a letter from the half-breed in Australia, confessing to the shooting of Tex. Later Tex recovers his memory, and entirely clears Jack of the attempted murder and horse stealing. Later, seeing Bess' preference, he nobly gives up the girl to Jack, after exacting a promise from his rival to "cut out all booze." Harper relents and turns Jack's horse over to him, resplendent in a new lady's silvermounted saddle, remarking, "Wedding present, Jack, but he's still in my family."

THROUGH NIGHT TO LIGHT (Nemo—Three Parts).—Tom Wright, a young man, proposes to Dorothy Wilson before leaving to take up settlement work in New York. She accepts, but tells him he has to wait. Shortly after Tom leaves for New York, Jack Green secures work in Judge Wilson's law office. A short time afterwards Jack becomes heir to a fortune. He also falls in love with Dorothy. Dorothy finally decides that she cares more for Jack than she does for Tom. Jack goes to New York and receives his money. He starts to spend it, and after a short time finds that he is reduced to a state of want. In the meantime, Dorothy has come to New York to study music. She starts to lead a gay life with Jack. One night Jack assaults a man, and is sent to the hospital. Dorothy sinks lower and lower. She finally decides to end it all, as she is not fit for decent society. She jumps in the river, but is rescued by Tom Wright's co-workers in the slums. She is at once recognized by them as Tom Wright's former sweetheart. Jack, after he is released from the hospital, sees the error of his way, and Tom reunites the misguided pair.

JANE EYRE (Whitman—Four Parts).—This is a picturization of the world-famous novel by Charlotte Bronte. Jane Eyre, a tutor in the home of Edward Fairfax Rochester, whose wife became insane after the birth of their first child, is coveted by Rochester, who plans to secretly marry Jane without disclosing to her the fact that he has a wife living. The insane wife learns of the state of her husband's affections and with maniacal cunning succeeds in burning down the Rochester mansion, but herself perishes in the flames, thus leaving the way clear to an honorable union between Jane Eyre and Mr. Rochester.

LENA RIVERS (Whitman—Five Parts).—Lena Nichols falls in love with a wealthy young collegian who is staying in a little New England town and has chosen to call himself by the first two of his names only, the full name being Harry Rivers Graham. He marries Lena under the name of Rivers, and after a short period of married bliss is recalled to his home. Lena thinks Harry has deserted her, and returns home to give birth to a little baby girl. Broken-hearted, Lena dies. The baby is called Lena after the mother. Harry has been informed that his wife is dead and that it will be useless to try to locate his child.

Years pass. Harry marries again, moves to Kentucky, and sends his stepson, Durward, to school in the East. Durward meets Lena and soon they are enraptured in a youthful love affair. But Durward's love is evanescent, but cools off when he again meets Carrie, his first little sweetheart. Meanwhile Harry Rivers Graham has come to realize that Lena is his daughter, but he fears to tell his wife and stepson, and instead shows Lena many attentions to try to make her life more happy. These attentions are misunderstood by his wife and Durward, and the complications that arise cause Lena to leave her uncle's home. Her collapse under the burden of her troubles, her recovery and the acknowledgment by her father, coupled with Durward's loyalty, form a climax well in keeping with Mary Jane Holmes' novel of the same name.

THE WITNESS INVISIBLE (Blinkhorn—Three Parts).—George Neville, son of an eminent professor of medicine, is reminded by Hedda, a former "flame," of his promise to create a sensation on her behalf by making magnificent artificial diamonds, and thus gain for her tremendous publicity. A jealous rival seeks to frustrate the plan, but cannot be certain of Neville's identity, as he always wears a black mask when going to and from the theater. A secret camera is therefore installed, and this invisible witness takes pictures of a terrible accident—some of which give the true state of things, while others seem proof that Neville is the murderer of Hedda. Neville's father is terribly upset, and is forced to believe his son guilty, and hands him over to the police. But the shrewd police, unconvinced of George's guilt, begin an investigation on their own account, with eminently satisfactory results.

THE AVIATOR TRAITOR (Blinkhorn—Three Parts).—William Horner, an ex-aviator, endeavors to steal the plans of a new high-powered aeroplane made to the specifications of Government Aviator Stewart. The machine has been ordered by her government from Miss Gertrude Martin, proprietor of the Martin Auto & Aero Co., where Stewart is employed as aviation expert. Horner is Miss Martin's cousin, and because of this relationship many of his peccadilloes are overlooked. In the course of the photodrama there is a magnificent series of panoramic effects taken from high altitudes showing the tremendous utility of the aeroplane in modern warfare, and in one portion is shown an actual espionage incident from the present European conflict, wherein after spying out the enemy's forts, harbors, warships, etc., the aviator returns to earth by means of an exciting spiral descent or "corkscrew volplane." A mysterious "General C.," in reality chief agent of the enemy's Secret Service Bureau, works hard to get the precious plans, first instructing Horner to obtain them by fair means or foul, and then offering Stewart the tremendous bribe of $275,000. The feature is replete with exciting incidents, including Stewart's hazardous jump from his aeroplane on to the top of a swiftly-moving railroad car, his uncoupling the car in which Horner rides in fancied security, whilst the train is in motion; and when Horner dismounts to axiously inquire as to the stoppage of his train, Stewart quietly regains possession of his purloined plans, runs to his waiting aeroplane and brings back the precious papers to the hands of his beloved Gertrude.

UNDER THE GASLIGHT (Biograph-K. & E.—Four Parts).—Judas, the Courtland family servant, discharged for stealing, returns to her husband, William Byke, and her baby daughter, who is being cared for by Blossom, a girl waif. Judas, eager for revenge, plans to substitute her baby for the Courtland infant, confident that she can carry out her scheme as the babies bear a striking resemblance to each other. The exchange of the babies is successfully made. A few years elapse and Pearl, Byke's daughter, is raised as Courtland's child, while Laura, the Courtland child, is brought up as Byke's daughter and taught to steal. Laura is caught stealing by her own father and mother—the Courtlands. Laura's tale of how her "papa" makes her steal, touches the Courtlands and they adopt her (their own child) after making a money settlement with Byke.

Laura and Pearl are about twenty when the Courtlands die, leaving their fortune equally divided between the two girls. Pearl is secretly in love with Ray Trafford, Laura's suitor. Byke plans to blackmail Laura and gets Snorky, an ex-soldier, to deliver her the following note: "My darling daughter—I think it's about time you had a talk with me. I am outside waiting to see you. Your own father. Wm. Byke." Laura faints and Pearl reads the note. Byke enters the house but is thrown out by Ray. Pearl tells Ray Laura's story and hands him the note. Ray gives vent to his shocked feelings and Laura interprets his action to mean that he is ashamed of her. Laura takes off her engagement ring and goes to her room. Through the prevarications of Pearl, Laura is led to believe that Ray does not care to see her again and likewise Ray believes that his dismissal is final. Ray writes Laura that he loves her even though her parents are of low origin. Through Pearl's craftiness this note is never delivered to Laura.

Byke and Judas attempt to kill Blossom, as she knows the truth about Laura and Pearl, but they are frustrated by Snorky. At the Rensaeller reception, Pearl plans Laura's disgrace. She drops Ray's note to Laura, which is found by Mrs. Rensaeller, whereupon Laura is snubbed by all. Humiliated, Laura goes away, leaving a note saying that her share of the estate goes to Pearl. Ray at once begins a search for Laura and engages Snorky to assist. Byke and Judas, seeking to obtain hush-money from Laura find Laura's note, stating that she leaves her money to Pearl. They discover Laura's lodging-house and abduct her. Laura is taken to Byke's den on the river front. Unless Laura agrees to sign over her fortune, her chances of living are dubious. Blossom discovers Laura's plight and notifies Snorky. Through Snorky, Laura is saved, but Snorky is caught by Byke. Snorky, firmly bound to the piling and left to drown by inches, is rescued by Ray and Blossom.

Laura, escaping across the river, is found by Snorky. She seeks safety in a tool house by the railroad track. Snorky is again caught by Byke and bound to the track, and left to his fate. Laura, observing, is frantic when she finds the tool house door locked. With the aid of an axe, she breaks open the door and reaches Snorky just in time to save him from certain death, as the train is bearing down upon him. Byke and Judas go to Pearl at the Courtland's summer home and Judas tells Pearl she is her mother. Pearl realizes the bitter truth of her parentage when Blossom confirms Judas' assertion. Pearl upbraids Judas and turns her from the house. Snorky brings Laura to Ray at the Courtland home, where they meet Byke. Snorty shoots Byke, who staggers out and falls dead at the feet of Judas. Judas, widowed and disowned by her daughter, leaves in despair. Pearl confesses that she and not Laura is the daughter of Judas and Byke and begs Laura's forgiveness for the wrong she has done, which Laura in her new found happiness readily grants.

THE WOMAN IN BLACK (Biograph K. & E. Special—Four Parts—Nov.).—To save her father from suicide and disgrace, Stella Everett consents to marry Robert Crane, a wealthy politician, and breaks her engagement with Frank Mansfield, Crane's rival for congressional honors. Crane has ruined a young gypsy girl named Mary, and her mother, Zenda, known as the Woman in Black, seeks him to avenge the wrong. Chancing to see a campaign poster bearing Crane's picture, she plunges a dagger into it as Mansfield passes by. Puzzled by her action, he learns her story, and brings the two gypsies to Stella, who is to marry Crane next day. Everett, hearing the facts, is about to call the marriage off, but the Woman in Black proposes a scheme. The marriage takes place as arraned, and Crane, lifting his bride's veil, uncovers the face of Mary, the girl he wronged. Zenda buries the dagger in his heart. Mansfield is elected to the office and marries Stella.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY (Episode Twenty-one—Reels Forty-one and Forty-two).—After Braine's narrow escape the conspirators kept under cover for a time, fearing that the Russian Minister of Police, Henri Servan, might have some plan made for their capture. Norton, realizing this, leaves on a hurried trip to Washington, where he meets Vice-President Marshall, Speaker Champ Clark, Secretary of War Garrison, United States Treasurer Burke and a host of other dignitaries, whose interest he seeks to enlist in locating the vanished Hargreave and in frustrating the future schemes of the gang, who have so often threatened Florence's life.

In the meantime there is a mysterious visit to the well in which the treasure box has been concealed. The same mysterious hands remove the chest from the depths, open it, and taking out one of the sealed receptacles it contains, extract an official looking document. The treasure chest is then returned to its former resting place in the well. That night Braine and the Countess Olga seated in the Broadway Rose Gardens see a mysterious hand thrust itself through the curtains near their table. The hand holds the document, which had lately reposed in the treasure box. It is addressed to Henri Servan. The Countess Olga takes the document, the hand vanishes, and with Braine she quickly leaves the Gardens.

Meanwhile Florence, who has become suspicious of the Countess Olga, pays a visit to the house, and here she is concealed when the Countess and Braine return. She sees the Countests conceal the document under a piece of statuary and as soon as she is left alone, she makes off with it. Later, when the loss is discovered, Braine and Olga realize that it must have been Florence who stole the precious paper.

Braine at onec sets out for the Hargreave mansion. On the way he meets another member of the gang who accompanies him. In the garden they see old Jones, the butler, and another man, whom Braine recognizes as the Russian Minister of Police, conferring on a rustic bench. They are closely examining the much-sought papers. Waiting until Jones goes into the house on an errand, the two conspirators fall upon Servan and after gagging and binding him securely to the bench, recover the papers.

Florence and Norton, who have just returned from a horseback ride, have left their horses with the groom in front of the stable, and thither Braine makes his way. Before the astonished groom realizes his intention, he has sprung into the saddle of the nearest mount and made off. Running into the house, the groom informs old Jones of what has happened, and the butler feeling certain that the conspirators again have the precious documents in their hands, sets out in pursuit on the other horse.

While Jones is galloping madly after Braine, Servan manages to free himself from his bonds and rushing frantically into the house he tells the astonished Norton and Florence of his loss. Norton, whose automobile is at the door, without waiting for the others to follow him, springs into it and sets off in the wake of Jones and the fast fleeing Braine. Unfortunately, however before has gone far, he commences to have engine trouble, and after several ineffectual attempts to keep the car running, he leaves it in the road and hastens on foot to a nearby garage, where he engages another machine and continues the mad chase.

As he comes near a high bridge he sees Jones and Braine engaged in a life and death struggle. Both fall from their horses and continue the battle on the bridge. Old Jones is putting up a game fight, but his years and the superior strength of his antagonist make the struggle one-sided. Leaping from the auto Norton throws himself into the melee and Braine realizes that his advantage is lost and that he is in desperate danger of capture. Slipping his coat, although it contains the papers for which he had risked so much, he leaves the garment in the hands of his two antagonists and dives over the bridge rail into the river forty feet below. Jones and Norton, content to have regained the precious document, watch him swim to safety.

THE MAN WHO COULD NOT LOSE (Favorite Players—Five Parts—Nov. 16).—Champney Carter, a writer, late one night receives a telegram from his publishers stating that he must deliver on the following morning the manuscript of the novel he has contracted to write for them. Not one word of the story has been written yet. Putting a piece of paper in his typewriter, he begins his tale, "The Man Who Could Not Lose." Through the long hours of the night he writes with frenzied haste.

The Story.—Jackson Carter, an elderly man, through gambling on the races, finds himself penniless and in debt to Sol Burbank, a bookmaker, for a large amount. The bookmaker makes repeated demands for the money and at last, after a stormy interview, threatens Carter with exposure. From the shock the unfortunate man is stricken with heart failure and falls dead at Burbank's feet.

Champney Carter, the gambler's son, leaves college and makes a vow to sooner or later wreak vengeance upon the man who caused his father's death. Young Carter becomes a writer and earns a precarious livelihood as an author. His first novel, the "Dead Heat," is a failure.

At this time he meets Dolly Ingram, the daughter of a wealthy banker, falls in love with her, but his attentions meet with the objection of her father, who wishes her to marry a nobleman. Carter elopes with Dolly and for a while they live near poverty, when, in a dream, he sees a horse named Dromedary win the Suburban handicap. The next day he places all his money upon the horse and wins at 40 to 1. Time and time he picks the winning horse, and finally drives Sol Burbank from the track—a bankrupt.

Owing to his marvelous luck he is called "The Man Who Could Not Lose." When his winnings total half a million dollars he stops gambling. A reconciliation is effected between his wife and her father and all ends happily.—End of story.

The next morning bright and early the girl from the publishers comes for the story. He is amazed to find that she is the exact counterpart of the heroine of the story, which is a great success. Six months later he wins her heart and she becomes Mrs. Champney Carter.

WHEN FATE LEADS TRUMP (Excelsior—Five Parts).—Gordon, the only son of a smuggler chief, is sent with a companion from his father's stronghold to travel so that he may learn the ways of the world. At their first stopping place he falls in love with a young woman, Marion Williams, and marries her against his father's orders, keeping her in ignorance of who he is and what his past has been. Shortly after his marriage he receives a message that his father is dying, and in his attempt to visit his parent secretly is seriously injured. His wife nurses him back to health, and then demands an explanation. He confessed all, and because of the great love she bears him and their child she forgives and even consents to accompany him on a visit to his father.

While there the band, including Gordon, is captured by the customs police, but Marion escapes, becomes lost in the wilderness and is found almost drowned in a mountain stream by Jim Bartlett, the paymaster of a lumber camp. As a result of her privations her memory of the past is a blank. She marries Jim. After several years Gordon and his companion are released from prison and return to the mountains. They apply to Bartlett for work, but he has no places for them.

Continuing on their way they reach Jim's cabin, and Gordon, leaving his companion on the outside as a lookout, enters to rob it.

Inside he sees a woman and attempts to overpower her. In the struggle he meets her face to face—it is his wife. The shock restores her memory. At this moment Jim enters the cabin and in astonishment beholds his wife in another man's arms. Not receiving an explanation, he turns to Gordon and says, "I will give you one hour to explain—or fight."

For Marion's sake he leaves in silence, removes the bullets from the cartridges in his revolver, and in the duel which follows is mortally wounded. His foe, learning of his act, removes him to the cabin where Gordon, with his last breath, whispers, "I married her years ago; she thought me dead."

THE SPIRIT OF THE CONQUEROR; OR, THE NAPOLEON OF LABOR (Phoenix—Five Parts).—The shades of departed spirits gather on the borderland of Paradise to meet a messenger returning from the earth who reports that all humaunity is suffering because of the conflict between capital and labor. The "Master of Re-incarnation" tells the shades that there is a great work to be done on earth—that a body on earth awaits a soul. He tells the shades to select a proper man—and they select the spirit of the Conqueror Napoleon. With his genius of organization applied to peace instead of war, the shades think he can best solve the world's problems. The Master of Reincarnation leads him to the house of Peter Morgan, the great financier, and the soul of Napoleon enters into the body of the son when he is born an hour later, and is christened James Morgan.

Years later, we see James returning from college, enter the office of his father. Edith Webb, the daughter of an old inventor, who has been defrauded by Morgan senior, calls to plead his case—but only to get the reply "Your father should read his contracts before signing—the matter is closed now." James disapproves of his father's business methods, and tells him so. He hears of a new cut in wages by his father, and meets the union labor leader, Malone. Peter Morgan gives a dinner in honor of his son's arrival, and James voices his disapproval of the wage cut. The father threatens disinheritance if the son interferes. This decides James' course, and he goes to the union mass-meeting, telling them who he is, and saying he will lead their strike.

He tells them to be law-abiding. Edith Webb and her father ask him to share their humble home. It is not long before James proves his genius of organization to the labor leaders of the world. James succeeds in forming an international labor association and calls a general strike, but his health breaks down under the strain. The general strike is called, and all union labor, perfectly organized, walks out to enforce its demands on the Universal Employers' Association, of which the senior Morgan is president. Three months later we see the gigantic strike still on—the commerce of the country paralyzed, and militia and army refuse to act against workmen. There is no violence. The President sends a committee of Senators to interview James Morgan on his sick bed, attended by Edith, whom he has grown to love. The Senators persuade capital to give into the demands of labor. James Morgan has won the great victory of labor—but when his father comes to call on him, and acknowledge the son a better general, James passes away—the spirit of the Conqueror goes again to Paradise, where his soul is welcomed back by the other shades, while millions of men on earth have their joy in the great labor victory dimmed by the loss of their beloved leader.

OATH OF THE SWORD (Japanese-American—Three Parts).—The scene opens in Japan, and in a number of wonderfully beautiful scenic settings the young love of Masao and the lovely Hisa are shown. Sweethearts from childhood, the two decide to marry, just before Masao goes away to study in America. Masao is very ambitious and makes a very great success at the University of California, taking many prizes for his athletic prowess, and becoming the favorite of both faculty and students. He is seen winning running and swimming races. The picture takes us back to his beloved Hisa, who is very lonely, and her grief is added to by the death of her father. As he is passing away he administers to her "Katano," or the oath of the sword, which means that in case she commits sin, she is bound by honor to commit hara kiri, killing herself with the sacred family sword. She is left with her mother and brother. Then the film shows more triumphs of Masao at the University, and a letter from him telling of his love for Hisa. At a reception on the University field day he meets Captain Doane and his wife. Next we see Capt. Doane boarding his ship and going out through the Golden Gate. The ship is wrecked by a typhoon near the Japanese shore, and Doane, almost dead, is rescued from the water by Hisa and her brother. He is taken to Hisa's house, and when he is convalescent a love springs up between them, Hisa forgetting Masao completely. Misa's brother does not approve of the new love, but is powerless to prevent it, and we see Hisa married to Doane, who decides to forget his wife at home and take a new name. He establishes himself, and in another year is in control of the local fishing industry. Next we see Masao, after his four years' course, taking leave at college. He comes home, and not knowing Hisa is married, goes to her house. He finds her with a baby, and is astonished. Just then Doane comes in, and Masao recognizes and denounces him. Doane flees. Masao follows, and after a hard fight kills him. When Masao returns to Hisa's house he finds that she has kept the oath of the sword, and killed herself for the sin of her unfaithfulness.

FOR KING AND COUNTRY (Six Parts).—The old King of Servia, no longer able to bear the burden of the government, abdicates in favor of the Crown Prince, and a Regency is established during his youth. Prince Francis, dissatisfied with the policies of the Regent, rebels against the Regent and attempts to prevent the coming coronation of Sergius. He is, however, overwhelmingly crushed at the battle of Zura and retires, a broken man, with his beautiful daughter, shorn of all rank, to a life of seclusion in Paris. The Crown Prince is soon afterwards sent to complete his studies in that city, and by chance meets the beautiful princess, without either of them knowing the other's identity. He falls in love with her immediately, and, gaining the exiled Prince's consent, he marries her without disclosing his true identity.

Several years later, when he returns to be crowned, the Princess Sonia wishes to marry him, in order to ascend the throne with him, but, upon being repulsed by him, she plots the destruction of the Crown Prince, and, with the aid of the Regent and the Chancellor, finds out the secret of Sergius's romantic marriage. She succeeds in trapping both him and his young son and nearly succeeds in carrying out her despicable plans. The Crown Prince, however, has a few steadfast friends at Court, who, organized in his defense, conduct a series of daring counterplots that finally bring victory in a most clever way to Sergius and his beautiful bride, and the coronation proceeds with all the pomp and glory of the magnificent Servian Court.

PARAMOUNT.

THE STRAIGHT ROAD (Famous Players—Four Parts).—Moll O'Hara, a child of the gutter, grows up with the horrible example of her drunken mother before her, and when, reaching womanhood, the girl loses her mother she keeps as a terrible souvenir the mother's craving for liquor, thrust upon the child when helpless to defend itself. But, save for the love of drinking and of fighting, Moll keeps to "the straight road," and the other temptations of her squalid life leave her unscathed. One day Moll is attacked by Liz, a disreputable woman, in Bill Hubbell's saloon; the two women fight, and are arrested. On their way past the settlement, Ruth Thompson, a wealthy young settlement worker, and her fiance, Douglas Aines, see the pitiful procession, but Ruth insists that Moll and the others be brought into the settlement until she has the affair investigated. They come in, and with them Bill Hubbell, the handsome and athletic saloon-keeper, and when he tells the true story of Moll's being first attacked by Liz, Moll is released, at the solicitation of Ruth Thompson. When the others have gone, Ruth pleads with Moll to quit drinking, and, aided by the pleading of Mike Finnerty, a little crippled boy, Moll at last gives in, the callous indifference of her nature vanishes, and she becomes a different creature. Mrs. Finnerty, made kindly by Moll's love for little Mike, takes her home with her, and a new life begins for Moll. Bill Hubbell, the saloon-keeper, instead of being offended by Moll's abstaining from his wares, encourages her, and a friendship springs up between the two that soon ripens into romance. But Douglas Aines, though engaged to Ruth, with the day set for their wedding, has determined to make a conquest of Moll, and one day, just as she is leaving Ruth, having told of her engagement to Bill, Aines follows and catches her in his arms. Ruth comes upon them, and Aines treacherously throws the fault on Moll, pretending that she had made advances to him, which he was repelling. Naturally, Ruth believes the man she loves in preference to the girl from the gutter, but at last promises the frantic Moll that she will come to her rooms at Finnerty's at 6 o'clock the following evening. After Moll leaves, Aines follows, as Moll knew he would, and begs that he be allowed to visit her. She coquettes with him and promises to be at home to him at six next evening, determined that Ruth shall find him and realize his vileness and the truth of Moll's story. But Bill Hubbell sees and overhears the appointment, and the next night when Aines calls, Bill, instead of Ruth, bursts into the room and sees Aines in the act of embracing Moll. In vain Moll tries to tell Bill the trap she had set for Aines. He laughs scornfully, and when Ruth enters tells her what he saw. Aines sneaks away, and both Ruth and Bill leave, believing Moll guilty. The frenzied and desperate Moll seizes the whiskey Aines had brought her and starts to drink, determined to go back to the gutter, when her despairing eyes fall on the sweet pictured face of the Madonna, a gift from Ruth. Throwing away the liquor, Moll falls on her knees and prays for succor and vindication. How her prayer is answered, her enemy crushed, her innocence established and her love and faith restored is developed in the climax of this drama.

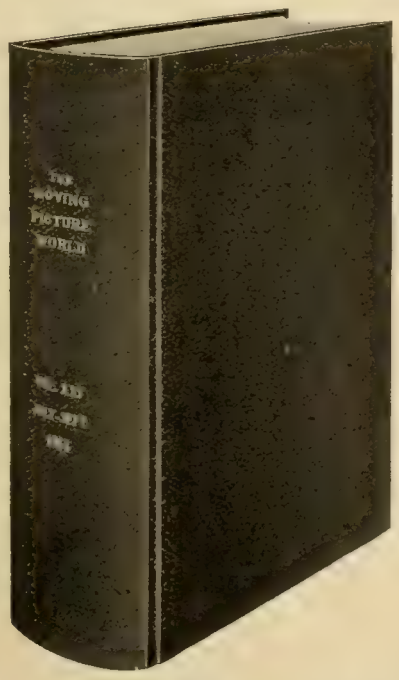
THIS IS YOUR OPPORTUNITY



To acquire a unique book of compelling interest.

At the end of each quarter year, we have bound in book form every issue of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD for the previous three months, including a complete index of all releases during that period.

The result is, instead of having individual copies of the publication accumulating for months and probably years, only to be misplaced or maybe lost, you have an interesting and attractive Library of Quarterly BOUND VOLUMES, bound in dark green cloth.

War! War! War!

The European War has completely shut off export business. We are caught with a big supply of Wonder Clocks that we must market quickly to get the cash.

THIS IS YOUR OPPORTUNITY to add a new, absolutely unique and startling money-maker, and a sure-as-fate crowd-puller. Imagine a tremendous clock on your wall or ceiling, with hands seemingly suspended in air, keeping absolutely correct time all the time, while an announcement flares forth from the dial's center. Be an innovator, not an imitator. Now is the time to take a

Wonder Clock

It occupies very little space—placed on electric fan bracket and throws stereopticon clock face anywhere you want it. It takes power from ordinary socket. Amazes audience and always shows correct time. Requires winding only once a week.

Use the space on the dial for announcing features or sell it to local advertisers and make a handsome profit

Many theatres make the Wonder Clock their best advertising novelty, while others make it bring a rich profit. Doesn't interfere with pictures, spreads no light over house and only illuminates exact space occupied by the phantom time-piece.

Regular Price $125.00

Special Sacrifice Price $50

This advertisement will not appear again, and we reserve the right to withdraw the special sacrifice price advertised without notice. If you want a Wonder Clock, send in your order at once and if remittance for $50.00 is made by New York Draft, Post Office or Express Money Order, your Wonder Clock will be shipped the same day order is received.

Warning to Exhibitors

Keystone films have become so popular that unscrupulous dealers are at work again selling dupes throughout the country.

Only genuine Keystone films are sold or rented by G. W. Bradenburgh in Philadelphia, who will ferret out those duping Keystone films and sell them genuine prints at cheaper prices than dupes can be made for and include posters free.

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and anyone can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact, they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of $3.50 we will send, by parcel post, prepaid and insured, the following:
24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address:

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

Phenomenal Growth of the UNIVERSAL!

Omaha!

The Universal has 19 out of the 32 theatres in Omaha. This is within a fraction of SIXTY PER CENT OF THE TOTAL BUSINESS. And remember, the Universal is not taking any part in the cut-throat price war! Think of it!

Vancouver!

There are 30 theatres in Vancouver and suburbs running pictures and of this number 17 are Universal. Over fifty per cent, and in the face of redhot competition and price cutting.

Pittsburgh!

Thirty-seven out of the total of one hundred theatres in Pittsburgh are Universal. And some that are not taking Universal service wholly are taking a partial service. Pittsburgh has over 30 exchanges!

Atlanta!

There are 10 picture theatres in Atlanta, three of which are exclusively Universal; two others use another program; another uses a third program and the rest are miscellaneous.

Florida!

The Universal is doing 44 per cent of THE TOTAL BUSINESS IN FLORIDA PICTURE THEATRES. There are 90 such theatres in the state and we have 40 of them. Not long ago we didn't have a corporal's guard!

Twin Cities!

In Minneapolis the Universal serves 23 houses with the regular program. Our nearest competitor serves only 18. In St. Paul the Universal has 13 houses. Our nearest competitor has only 7. Quality always wins!

MAJESTIC AND KOMIC GUIDE FOR EXHIBITORS

In which we try to tell only the truth about all Majestic and Komic releases.

THE LITTLE COUNTRY MOUSE (1 Reel Majestic) Release date Tuesday, Nov. 17—A pleasing story and picture play featuring Blanche Sweet, in which a young girl is saved from the snares of high society.

THE SAVING GRACE (2 Reel Majestic) Release date Sunday, Nov. 22—A decidedly refreshing and entertaining comedy drama, with Dorothy Gish in the leading part. The new parson redeems the simple country girl from ignorance and by his vigorous action saves the father from crime.

ETHEL HAS A "STEADY" (1 Reel Komic) Release date Sunday, Nov. 22—No. 11 of the famous Bill, the Office Boy, stories of Paul West, featuring Fay Tincher as Ethel, the stenographer. A good number, in which Bill's love letter causes trouble for Ethel.

ANOTHER CHANCE (1 Reel Majestic) Release date Tuesday, Nov. 24—A melodrama of fair interest and quality, in which an ex-convict is saved from a return to crime by the interference of a crippled newsboy whom he had befriended.

THE SISTERS (2 Reel Majestic) Release date Sunday, Nov. 29—Featuring Lillian and Dorothy Gish. For our candid opinion see announcement above. The story tells of a mutual love and sacrifice of two young mothers under circumstances that will touch the heartstrings of every spectator.

A CORNER IN HATS (1 Reel Komic) Release date Sunday, Nov. 29—A very good farce with a novel idea, showing how much trouble an industrious dog can create.

BE A BIG MAN

DON'T confine the limits of your vision to the length of your nose. Don't hug the false idea that you know all there is to know about the motion picture business. Don't be one of those short-sighted nickel-squeezers who condemns everything that doesn't bear his trade-mark. Show yourself to be a man of breadth. Give credit where credit is due.

GREAT GAME OF BRAINS

The motion picture game requires brains—not brains in the crude state that God gave them to you, but brains that sparkle with intelligence—that show signs of training and development. Get down to brass tacks. Be frank, honest and truthful with yourself. Admit that—

BALBOA FEATURE FILMS

Have invaded the field and forced a lot of old fogies to slip a mournful note into their boastful tune. Balboas have stepped right to the front, and on the strength of their merit alone, have carved out permanent places for themselves in the estimation of exhibitors and the hearts of the people.

SURE-FIRE MONEY-GETTERS

Balboas have passed the experimental stage. Their standard of excellence is established and will be maintained. They grow better all the time. So it's up to you—Mr. Exchange Man—to install Balboa guns in your fortifications. Make arrangements to include them in your program. The Balboa Company has a producing capacity of twenty thousand feet of finished negative every six days and is ready to supply you with one or more features each week. Remember St. Elmo, Will O' the Wisp, The Criminal Code, Sacrificial Fires, The Square Triangle, Rose of the Alley, and the scores of other Balboas that are making motion picture fans sit up and take notice all over the United States. Get Busy. Write or wire today.

Tremendous Opportunity For Wide-Awake State Right Buyers

The Balboa Amusement Producing Company, of Long Beach, California, manufacturers of St. Elmo, which has smashed box office records all over the country and will continue in popular esteem for years to come, is now ready to dispose of the state rights of

Beulah in 6 Reels

Beulah was written by Augusta J. Evans as a sequel to St. Elmo and has been read by generation after generation of book-loving Americans. It is a wonderful story wonderfully told—a romance of the Southland—a genuine, heart-gripping work of fiction with a bigger plot, more action, deeper mystery, sweeter sentiment and stronger passions than St. Elmo. It adapts itself to the screen with surprising ease and as a motion picture offering will stand supreme among the masterpieces of cinematography.

What St. Elmo Has Done and Will Do

Since its release St. Elmo has been in constant demand by exhibitors in every section of the United States. It will make more net profit than any other motion picture attraction now before the public.

Beulah in 6 Reels

Will be an elaborate production with more than 200 gorgeous scenes. The cast is one of the strongest ever assembled. St. Elmo is great, but Beulah will be greater—greater because of the more extensive experience and improved equipment of the Balboa Company which now has a hundred winning features to its credit.

You Take No Chances With Balboas

Balboa features, always highly dramatic and rife with human interest, are perfect in photography and all those essentials that combine to make crowd-drawing, money-making photo-plays. If you are in the market for the state rights of Beulah, get in touch with us at once. Write or wire without delay. This is the first Beulah announcement and in view of the unprecedented success of St. Elmo, Will O' the Wisp, The Criminal Code, The Square Triangle, The Rose of the Alley and other Balboa films, there will be a big demand for our latest and greatest motion picture achievement.

JULIUS CAESAR

SIX PARTS

"Pictorially, educationally and artistically, 'Julius Caesar' is a photo-play which should grip the public attention as few have done. It is a masterpiece of dignity . . . the latest Kleine feature should be an instantaneous hit . . . Anthony Novelli is an artist . . . who knows his audience and how best to get his effect. . . ."

D., in THE MORNING TELEGRAPH, Sunday, November 8.

"There is that rare ingredient in spectacles of the kind, a clearly presented and coherent story. We are told that 20,000 people were engaged in the making of the drama, and that a miniature city of Rome, covering six square blocks, was constructed. Both statements are easily credited in view of the magnificent results. For classic roles Novelli is perhaps the most thoroughly equipped of all film actors."

D., in THE DRAMATIC MIRROR, November 11.

"There is not a dull moment throughout the story. . . . Once started, the film holds one in a grip of tense interest that never relaxes until the final scene. . . . This film really beggars description."

H. S. FULD, in MOTION PICTURE NEWS, November 21.

"The thread of the story has been dexterously woven, the intent evidently being to emphasize the human heart-interest. . . . Nowhere could I detect the slightest trace of padding . . . the dramatic and spectacular are joined with powerful effect."

W. STEPHEN BUSH, in MOVING PICTURE WORLD, November 21.

". . . Julius Caesar is a wonderful piece of photography, an amazing example of direction and almost a model in construction and continuity. . . . George Kleine has a fine piece of theatrical property in Julius Caesar. . . ."

GEORGE KLEINE

Mabel Trunnelle
as "Olive," the Gypsy Girl is creating for the Edison series

"OLIVE'S OPPORTUNITIES"

Every Tuesday
One of this Series will be released

THE character of "Olive" is that of a fascinating gypsy girl whose chief attractions, outside of her personalities, are a violin and a monkey. She infatuates Vance Coleman, a society swain, about to inherit a fortune, thereby inciting the jealousy of one of his society admirers, Laura Leslie. Drew Martin, a cousin, plots to do away with Coleman and also banish Olive that he may inherit the fortune.

THE "OLIVE'S OPPORTUNITIES" SERIES, briefly outlined:—(1) A GYPSY MADCAP (Released Tues., Nov. 24th). General Coleman plans to disown his son for his infatuation with "Olive" the gypsy girl. Olive saves the General's life. (2) THE GIRL OF THE OPEN ROAD (To be released Tues., Dec. 1st)—reveals a drowning accident planned by Martin, but frustrated by Olive, who rescues Coleman. (3) THE ROSE AT THE DOOR (To be released Tues., Dec. 9th). Martin's plan to have thugs drown Coleman recoils on himself by Olive's changing a rose from Coleman's to Martin's door. Martin barely escapes being drowned himself. (4) THE VANISHING OF OLIVE (To be released Tues., Dec. 15th)—reveals the banishment of Olive to a Chinese opium den and her discovery by the escaped monkey and final release by Coleman. (5) OLIVE IS DISMISSED (To be released Tues., Dec. 22nd) from a frivolous society leader's home, but reconciles husband and wife by her indiscretions. (6) THE LESSON OF THE FLAMES (To be released Tues., Dec. 29th). Coleman rescues Olive from a burning building which the fire inspectors had passed on for graft.

A fascinating, well-planned, well executed series with MABEL TRUNNELLE AT HER BEST.

OTHER FORTHCOMING EDISON REELS DESCRIBED

A DOUBLE ELOPEMENT (By Henry Beldon). A widow and a widower fall in love, but hide from each other the fact that one has a son grown up, the other a daughter of marriageable age. The real surprise comes when son and daughter elope and overtake the eloping widow and widower at the station. A hilarious scene ensues. Comedy. 1,000 ft. To be released Wed., Dec. 2nd.

WHO GOES THERE? (By H. A. Du Souchet). This is an adaptation of the famous play of the same name in which Walter E. Perkins took the title role of Lieut. Newman (known as "Toppy"). He takes the same part in the dramatization on this film, which is in two reels. Comedy. 2,000 ft. To be released Fri., Dec. 4th.

IT'S A BEAR (By Harry G. Bates). Louise Darkin insists on a hero for a lover. Buskins, who is infatuated with her, seeks a chance to show his heroism, and pretends to have killed a bear. The "bear" turns out to be a tramp rigged up as a dead bear. But Louise discovers the trick and scorns the engagement ring. Comedy. 1,000 ft. To be released Sat. Dec. 5th.

CRYSTALS; THEIR MAKING, HABITS AND BEAUTY. This is an educational film of the best kind. It shows how crystals of much beauty can be made by artificial means. The youthful chemist is seen at work and from substances as easily understood as table salt, epsom salts, and gunpowder, proceeds to form compounds very soothing to the eye. Educational. 500 ft. To be released Mon., Dec. 7th.

BUSTER BROWN CAUSES A COMMOTION (By R. F. Outcault). With sneezing powder as his stock in trade, Buster proceeds to use it effectively on Grandpa Brown, Mrs. Brown and the maid. Then he snaps Grandpa's picture (while he is spooning with the maid) and is chased all over the house by the irate Grandpa. A side-splitting film. Comedy. 550 feet. To be released Tues., Dec. 8th.

Facts and Comments

COMPLAINTS are often heard of the offensive methods adopted by venders of candy, etc., in motion picture houses. Just why such venders should be permitted in any but cheap houses it is hard to understand, but if the house thinks these peddlers necessary to its general welfare, a little discretion in the crying of their wares ought surely to be used. It is disconcerting to say the least to sit in a theater and follow the plot on the screen to the point where the afflicted mother kneels down to raise her voice in prayer for the safety of her son and then hear the raucous youth standing right near you shout the praise of "assorted chocolates and chewing gum." Even in the cheapest of the speaking theaters these peddlers must confine their activities to spasms between the acts, and even the lowliest villain is permitted to pursue the heroine without interruption from the candy man in front. There is no doubt at all that such practises "kill" all atmosphere and drive many patrons away. We do not know anything about the profits of this fitful selling but they must be enormous to overcome the damage they do.

EXHIBITORS in one of the states of the Far West are conducting an intelligent and dignified campaign against Sabbatarian fanaticism. They have taken the question of Sunday opening into the courts and are now placing their views on the situation before the public in a series of advertisements placed in the newspapers. We like their tone of toleration and their calm appeal to reason which are in marked contrast to the vehemence and intemperate language of their opponents. We have little doubt that public opinion everywhere is decidedly in favor of clean and wholesome motion picture entertainments on Sundays no less than on other days. Whenever the question has been submitted to the voters the verdict has been against a narrow observance of Sunday. A friend and reader who has a large theater in a city in Ohio writes to us that Sunday closing was defeated at a recent election by a substantial majority. We quote from one of the local papers: "The biggest majority on any of the side issues was recorded in favor of moving picture shows on Sundays. Those favoring clean amusements on Sunday and voting against the city ordinance closing the theaters on that day numbered 2,206 while the opposing side rallied only 1,075 votes." The enemies of Sunday opening made a very vigorous campaign and the issue was fully discussed in the press and on the stump. The credit for the victory is due to two causes: the lively agitation of the exhibitors and the clean character of their shows.

THE amount of money invested in the exhibiting and producing branch of our industry without any previous investigation exceeds all belief as we have pointed out more than once. We revert to the subject because of the activities of promoters in all parts of the country. Golden returns are promised upon small investments. Sometimes the promoters themselves show a shocking ignorance of actual conditions in the industry. None of them seem to be concerned with the grave problem of distribution. According to some of the literature which spread broadcast in city and country nothing more is required than a few hundred dollars to make a moving picture which it is presumed will then sell itself automatically. Theaters are built with little or no conception of a policy or of experienced management. Our advice to all who are approached by plausible promoters is to investigate first the promoters, then actual conditions of the industry and lastly the possibilities of the enterprise.

IN the news columns of The Moving Picture World will be found an exclusive report of the decision of Justice Davis of the Supreme Court sustaining the action of Commissioner of Licenses in forbidding the exhibition of the film "The Ordeal." We have pointed out the offensive portions of this film which violate the spirit of neutrality urged by the President. The decision of Justice Davis is of far-reaching importance because it judicially defines the powers of the Commissioner of Licenses. It is plain under the language of the decision that the commissioner has wide discretion in the premises. A correct inference from the decision leads us to the belief that the commissioner may stop pictures on other grounds than public decency. We believe in the freedom of the screen, but we are glad to see the abuse of it checked by the courts.

WE commend the relief plan for Belgian sufferers, briefly outlined in this issue, to the attention of our readers and ask them to help to the extent of their power. To aid men, women and children in such profound and undeserved misery is the right sort and the best sort of neutrality—the neutrality of the good Samaritan.

Stop the Vandals

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE most encouraging sign on the motion picture horizon is the recent increase of quality in features. No one who has watched this growth can fail to be impressed by its steadiness. There is nothing sporadic or occasional about this improvement in quality. It is most gratifying to note that we have today a good supply of high-class features and that this supply comes from various sources, being the result of wholesome and well-directed competition.

How do these pictures of high quality fare after they leave the studio and are passed to the exhibitor through the exchange? The importance of this question cannot be exaggerated. But recently I sat through a performance in a big motion picture theater located in a good-sized Eastern city. One of the best features recently produced, a theme full of virile Americanism wrought out in scenic surroundings of exceeding beauty was on the screen. The theater, which seats almost two thousand people, was well filled. Never in all my life had I seen a more atrocious presentation. The worst faults of the "original nickelodeon" were there. The projection was nothing less than a sin against light. The "music" was provided by a callow youth doing his fiendish worst on an instrument which seemed to have come down from Chinese antiquity. At times there was a faint resemblance to a piano; then came a hair-raising imitation of an organ followed by what seemed to be the echo of a human voice. The voice seemed to belong to a man whose vocal utterance was thickened by alcoholic excesses. Such a "musical" instrument might do fine for a "wheeze" in a dime museum or an added attraction at a side-show, but it was hideously out of place in an entertainment for intelligent human beings. The youth playing or rather torturing the aforesaid instrument had a habit of leaving his post at irregular intervals and then suddenly returning and once more tearing into the blessed silence.

The feature, on which highly gifted and highly trained minds had spent their best effort, and which has been acclaimed a genuine masterpiece by every audience, was slowly and painfully done to death. There was no order in the place and the atmosphere was bad to the point of being dangerous. Of course, I am speaking of "atmosphere" figuratively. The whole audience soon became demoralized. The way the feature was being shown encouraged the ignorant and vulgar few to ribald laughter and noisy demonstration. The intelligent portion of the audience—much the larger, of course—resented the obvious mishandling of the feature and many walked out. At the most pathetic moments in the play there were loud guffaws and idiotic giggles. The "pianist" had evidently but little brains, but such as it was he enlisted it on the side of vulgarity and played down to the lowest taste. Scene after scene of dramatic power and of great poetic beauty came on the screen and it all went for naught. At the end of the performance something like twenty slides were run announcing, amid a mass of cheaper productions, the coming of the best features now on the market. I suppose they will be "murdered" to the disgust of every desirable patron.

I need scarcely say that the place where these outrages occur is a "daily change" place. The waste of splendid material is not the worst feature. It is indeed bad enough to have a fine feature get but one day's showing in a city of more than a hundred thousand inhabitants. At this rate all the best features now on the market could be "used up" in a couple of weeks with a ridiculous minimum of returns to producer, distributor and exhibitor. The price of admission at this "theater" is ten cents.

These ruinous methods of "showmanship" came very near wrecking the producing of regular programs and in some parts of the country actually did wreck them. The growth and popularity of the feature was in no small measure due to the greed and short-sightedness of these "spoilers." The high-grade feature companies owe it to the industry at large and to themselves to keep away from such wasteful policies. I do not know what this particular theater paid for the hire of the film play which it handled in such cruel fashion, but I feel that no amount of money can ever justify such an outrage.

Perhaps this particular theater is an anomaly, a temporary but most annoying survival of the unfittest. There may be but a few theaters like it—I earnestly hope so, at any rate.

The evil ought to be stopped right now. It will pay the high-grade feature companies, who are so lavish with their money and so ambitious in their future projects, to pay a little attention to what happens to their product after it leaves their studio or their exchange. We believe that all these companies are now enforcing a rule which forbids their pictures being shown in so-called straight "nickelodeons." This is a step in the right direction, but they must in justice to themselves go a little further. They must exercise some degree of supervision over the men who present their pictures. It would pay them to have a corps of inspectors attached to the various exchanges who make it their business to stop vandalism of the sort I have been compelled to describe in this article. In spite of the great advance in surgery the quality of brains cannot be improved by operation. It is impossible to create intelligence where Nature has been barren in the first place. If a man engages in the exhibiting profession without the needed ability and intelligence he will, in the natural course of things, drop out of it. Where, however, the lack of intelligence results in dangerous waste of valuable property the natural process of elimination is too slow. High-class features ought not to be placed in the hands of men who are utterly incapable of doing them justice and who do the industry at large a lot of harm. There is no reason in the world why the presentation of high-class features ought not to be standardized. Once standardized any bad falling below the standard ought to result in a denial of service.

I have heard the excuse that "local conditions" are sometimes responsible for "poor handling" and that "our people would not understand real first-class presentation." Men whose gray matter is thus embedded in cobwebs of the past are more to be pitied than censured, but they are hopelessly wrong. Nothing is more ludicrous than the belief of some managers that the "folks in their towns" are peculiar and different from all the rest of the world. "Our folks would not understand" or "this town must have vaudeville" are some of the expressions we hear from the lips of such managers. These men will not wake from their fatal somnolence until a showman with brains and enterprise and undismayed by any spectre of "local conditions" comes to their city and gives the people an exhibition of modern motion picture showmanship and marches straight to the goal of prosperity. Then Rip Van Winkles will bestir themselves and become belated and unsuccessful imitators where, with credit and profit to themselves, they might have been glorious originators.

Some Weak Spots

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

INEXPERT conversion is one. A complete transformation may take place in any character—a man who has been low-spirited in trouble may suddenly become optimistic because of unexpected good news—but sudden changes of volition in a story should be handled with great care and a complete change of sentiment should have some powerful reason to be convincing. Unnecessary conversion, plainly visible in carelessly constructed plays, is amateurish and repellant to common intelligence. We dwell with the characters of a visualized experience but a short time, and, if we come to know them as we should, little inconsistencies are fatal to interest. If the leading character has been enforced by dominant traits, and the plot hinges on his conversion, too great pains cannot be taken to make the transformation of purpose logical.

A drinking man loves a refined woman and tries in vain to win her hand in marriage. At the last moment she obtains a pledge of sobriety and the story ends with the beginning of their happiness. Too easy. The woman may be convinced that it is all right, but the audience will remain skeptical. A tremendous self-struggle to master the habit of a lifetime, even with occasional lapses and final triumph, would be more convincing. The man who can master passion, feeling and habit with the dash of a pen is unlike those to whom we are accustomed. He is hardly human. It is too commonly believed that the highway to a certain hot place is paved with good intentions for the average audience to swallow the instantaneous reform of those most needing it. Many authors who see the necessity of strong motive for conversion neglect to provide it, and one such weak spot may kill the play.

From a superficial point of view, it might seem much easier to handle a change of sentiment, but such is not the case. There are capricious ladies and others who find it difficult to make up their minds, but when a woman really loves one man, the transfer of her affections to another is attended with some of the difficulty of unscrambling eggs. Authors find it hard work to disentangle a love knot and cut it as the easiest way—that is why their plays go wrong. The easiest way in any profound problem fails to make an audience feel and believe that it is a true way. The idealism involved where a woman loves deeply, the hopes aroused in her heart, the plans she has laid, the little castles she has built, are not to be swept away as Napoleon did the rooks and pawns, when defeated at a game of chess. The change must follow preparation and have a powerful motive.

Conversion is fascinating. One cannot write stories without feeling that the characters are acting and reacting on one another all the time, just as we are constantly influencing one another, just as each of us is gaining or losing by such varied experience as brings us into contact with other people; but it cannot be forgotten that there is an inherent force in each intelligent person which makes for decided individuality. That inherent force is bound to hold out for a time, like a besieged fort, before complete surrender. The author's full art is to reconcile the established character and outer circumstances so as to make the fascinating conversion a plausible one, and it should not only be convincing but it should be of sufficient importance to be well worth while—a big factor in the success of his story.

Haste of production confronts us with defective titles to screen stories and subtitles so bad in some cases that they are worse than none at all. Possibly the very worst title is one that has the appearance of being one of the best because it describes the play. We do not want the play described any more than we want a synopsis of it. What is the use of deadening interest by foreshadowing the result? Any audience is in a receptive mood and is willing to see a story worked out through mystifying complications for the pleasure of speculating how it is all to turn out at the end. A title that arouses curiosity, without gratifying it in the least, becomes an asset where one placarding the plot becomes a liability. It may, however, hint at a hidden force, such as destiny, or even nominate its application to a series of strange events, but it is most effective when it has more than one significance, thus leaving an audience in doubt, while stimulating curiosity.

The effect of subtitles is peculiar. Producers seem to favor them for clarity, whereas exhibitors are inclined to regard them with disfavor. There is reason on both sides. Certain relations between characters must be explained, and it is also necessary to designate lapses of time in one way or another, but subtitles proclaiming action to follow have the effect of telling the same thing twice in succession. I have more than once written an entire act, one reel, with a single subtitle, but that was simply because the action called for no more. In many other cases I have found that subtitles made the biggest hits, especially in comedy. With the application of time, patience and intelligent selection, the question of subtitles becomes one of no limitations. A pointed remark, a character revelation, an appropriate quotation, all these help rather than hinder.

Superfluity of characters is one of the weak spots in plays transformed from the stage production. They are very often destructive of interest for several reasons. First, they distract attention; second, they confuse the action; third, they render difficult the identification of principals; and, worse than all these three, they interfere seriously with characterization. Without fine characterization, requiring a concentration of effort, no play has much of a chance to be numbered among the best. The average audience should not be asked to master and keep in mind more than a handful of characters. If it is necessary to bring in an extra number for proper development of a story, treat them as little more than a background for the main line of action.

There is scarcely a dissenting voice among critics on the unadvisability of using theatrical costumes, those suited only to stage performance, those spotlessly clean and fresh from the wardrobe room, in exterior scenes, and, if characters pass from exteriors to interiors, the naturalness of attire must be considered. Village maidens in silks and satins, poor girls with black skirts patched like Joseph's coat, mobs that resemble the opera chorus, all these are as senseless as asking people to believe that a wife would not know her own husband in a false mustache. Opera bouffe on the greensward, ordinary people who make up with wigs and whiskers on short notice, and the like, are brought into this beautiful new art by people who are viewing it from a theatrical slant. Moving picture audiences are for congruity, and producers who do not know this merely announce that they are newcomers, unable to offer better than a conventional presentation of humanity, whereas the new art is really blazing the trail of TRUTH, with natural backgrounds, theatrical costumes and conventions seldom harmonize, and are therefore as seldom in good taste.

Vitagraph Prospects

Film Makers to Have Their Share in Wave of Business Prosperity.—Vitagraph Prepared to Handle Its Portion.

By Hanford C. Judson.

"THIS shows what we think of business prospects." Albert E. Smith, treasurer and general manager of the Vitagraph Company of America, said it as he smiled over the commodious new buildings and improvements at the Vitagraph Company's big Flatbush plant. A big business wave is surely coming. Messrs. Rock, Smith & Blackton are fairly reliable when it comes to business thinking—business, for instance, seems to find pretty good sailing around Flatbush even now.

Located, as the Vitagraph Company is, in a great metropolis, it has had to utilize its space intensively. When its new concrete factory is ready to go to work, which will be soon, it will be able to handle a very big volume of business. The business is confidently expected; the company is preparing in every way possible to meet and make the most of it. The new building will embody every known wrinkle to facilitate and speed along the material spun in the hearts and minds of novelists and story tellers, woven into film offerings by the Vitagraph people, and distributed to picture theaters all over the world. It is a great, four-storied building with thick walls of concrete and looks like a fort; but in this building the most elusive emotions that a poet can imagine will be given, as it were, a living body that millions may see and recognize. There is no other factory like a motion picture factory; it gets a kind of personality from the thing it deals in.

The concrete walls and flooring of the first story, which is devoted to the chemical treatment of the film—the developing, fixing, toning and tinting—have to be protected from the acid by a new water-proofing process that changes the surface. Without this protection the hypo and other reagents fairly eat up the lime in the concrete, so that it peels and cracks off. This work is done on the concrete after the walls are made, and when finished the surface for an inch deep is impervious to water or acid. The Hydrobar Company has charge of this work—the same company that waterproofed laboratories for the new Lubin developing rooms.

The second story has hard pine floorings and it is to be devoted to the drying frames. The two highest stories are broken conveniently into ample rooms such as can be used for offices, the upper story being particularly bright and well lighted. The hall on the third floor gives direct connection with both the studios and this will make it a convenient place for the rooms of the picture directors, the scenario department and the like. The property rooms, upholstering rooms, costume rooms and scene painter's gallery remain, as formerly, adjacent to the two big studios—the Vitagraph Company has a great out-of-doors studio which it contemplates roofing with glass.

One would be surprised at the amount of properties that a motion picture company has to keep on hand. Of course, it has the materials for making what looks like a bar—every moving picture company has that. But most people suspect that when a scene in a toy shop, a drug store, a department store or a boot shop is needed the producer gets an actual one; but it often is not so. A good picture company has all those things in stock ready at a moment's notice. It must have many other things, as, for instance, the uniforms and equipment of an army, modern and ancient. In the great democracy of the Vitagraph's property room one will find a Louis XIV. gilded settle hobnobbing familiarly with a flour-barrel arm chair sawed to the comfort of a backwoods' cabin. Mr. Spedon says that $25,000 would not buy the properties stored in the Flatbush plant.

Vitagraph quality is not made merely by the plant—the buildings and the company's means of making pictures. Personality and policy are big factors and the Vitagraph Company, its officers, take it as a gratifying compliment that the company was chosen to make the pictures of New York City for the Panama World's Fair at San Francisco. The Vitagraph Company was chosen to make all these by the committee, headed by Melville Fouquet, which was appointed to take care of the city's exhibit at the great show. These pictures will all tell a story woven into and around the working of each of the city's departments, such as police, fire, board of health—they are not to be dry, statistical pictures.

Mr. J. Stewart Blackton, the company's vice-president and secretary, told the writer that a fine serial picture was ready and that the company would begin issuing it the first of next year. This picture is to be released in two reel offerings every two weeks for twelve or more issues. It has been written by Charles Goddard, the playwright and Ralph Ince has had the direction of it. Anita Stewart and Earle Williams play the leads in the romance, which is filled with adventure and novelties "with a touch of history for good measure," Mr. Smith remarked—"and the glamour of science," Mr. Blackton at once added.

On the question of books as against plays for picture illustration, the Vitagraph Company has voted for books—novels. Mr. Blackton thinks, and he is quite right, too, that there's much better chance of a spectator's wanting to see a novel that he has read picturized than a play that he has seen and that he is more apt to have seen the play than read the book. Then the difficulty of keeping pictures free from hampering stage limitations is a real one, if a reviewer may judge by the pictures he sees. Mr. Blackton prefers to picture modern novels to the classics. The company has just bought the picture rights in their novels from a number of popular writers, including Cleveland Moffet, author of "Through the Wall" and other detective and mystery stories. Florence Warden, who is especially popular in England, is another author who has sold rights to them. She wrote recently that she had been watching pictures for some time and the Vitagraph quality has made her want all her stories filmed by them. Cyrus Townsend Brady and George Randolph Chester are two other authors—they need no introduction—whose stories will appear in Vitagraph pictures.

Showing the Vitagraph Company Making a Photoplay at Sea, with Camera Lashed to a Spar.

Some highly promising sea pictures are being made, and for these the Vitagraph Company procured rights in the novels of Morgan Robertson, spinner of sea yarns, and to give the right color, a square rigged ship. The big ship is out beyond Sandy Hook now and Robertson has been on board helping the director with advice. Some illustrations of the ship are printed herewith. It took many months to find the ship; but the trouble is going to be more than repaid. The players have had some real weather and have been far out where the ocean is truly king. Many beautiful camera pictures have been caught and it is said that they will be a wonder and a delight.

The ship is a three-masted Norwegian vessel; bark rigged and is commanded by Captain Neilson. It was built many years ago, has an iron hull and was a dandy in her day. Its cabin is of mahogany, though a bit dilapidated, as becomes its years. Some of the scenes show the ship under full sail and some show it on fire with an explosion on board.

Uncle Sam, Private Showman

United States Government to Place Orders for Projection Machines and Equipment for Use of Army.

THE fifth floor of the war side of the State, War and Navy Building at the present time looks like a gigantic showroom, and at stated periods, an imitation of a real motion picture exhibition is being given. The cause of the whole disturbance is the proposed purchase through the office of the Quartermaster General of sixty-six motion picture machines to be used by the chaplains of the army in giving illustrated lectures and motion picture exhibitions at the various army posts.

Proposals for the supply of 66 machines, a like number of phonographs, lights of 1,200 candlepower and of 100 candlepower, and 13,200 folding chairs were received on November 7, and at the present time a test is being made of the projecting machines prior to placing an order. The specifications demand that these machines shall have all attachments and rewinding apparatus complete, so that pictures can be projected from films or lantern slides. They shall be of full metal construction throughout, having strength and rigidity sufficient to prevent vibration, equipped with safety devices, and approved by the Underwriters Laboratories, Inc. Slide and reel carriers shall be of the best construction and easily manipulated, so as to bring the object into proper plane of projection, the reels shall be made from carefully selected material, sides smooth, all edges carefully rounded and mounted on core blocks to run true; bearings for all of the high-speed journals or pivots to be of phosphor bronze, held in place by screws. The objective lenses for both motion pictures and slides, shall be of the best lens glass, and shall be of standard size, carefully and accurately finished and focussed, so as to secure the maximum amount of illumination with sharp and uniform detail in the picture. The machine to have a neat and durable finish of Japan, black enamel, polished nickel-plated and copper oxidized finish applied on appropriate parts. Each machine shall be fully equipped so that either calcium, acetylene or electric arc light can be used. The calcium gas outfit to be a complete portable outfit, and to include every article necessary to furnish light ready for operation. The electric arc light outfit shall include an arc lamp and everything required for connection to an electric supply system. The acetylene attachment shall consist of a suitable burner for this gas and ten feet of tubing, readily attachable to the projection. A portable collapsible stand is also to be provided with the outfit.

The screens are to be twelve feet square, manufactured of the best material suitable for the purpose and be mounted on first-quality metal spring roller.

In view of the fact that at many of the Army posts there are no buildings suitable for the purpose, the Hettrick Bros. Company, of Toledo, Ohio, has been awarded a contract for the supply of sixty-six assembly tents, each forty feet by eighty feet, at a cost of $23,987.70. In the summer these tents will be utilized as airdomes.

The test of the machines was continued into the week ending Saturday, November 14, but it is expected that a selection will be made in the very near future.

New Liberty Film Co.

Formed at San Mateo, Cal., by Group of Wealthy Men—To Release Through Sawyer.

FROM San Mateo, Cal., will come another brand of films which will be added to the list of Sawyer, Inc., releases. The new Liberty Film Co. is backed by a group of Alaskan millionaires, among them being the famous Mr. Lindblum, who was one of the pioneers in the Nome gold mining industry. His home is at San Mateo, and there are in addition many palatial residences which will be at the disposal of the new producing concern.

Mrs. Emelee Johnson is general manager of the company, and when she was in New York last week she placed with Sawyer the first productions, which included over a dozen reels of single and multiple reel comedies and dramas.

Charles Bartlett, an actor and producer who won his laurels with Selig, Essanay, and other well-known manufacturers, is the director of the company. He plans to make six thousand feet a week with the two companies under his direction.

Negotiations are now pending with a famous star of the "legitimate" who has not yet appeared in motion pictures to head the Liberty cast, and reproduce for the screen several of her stage successes. Announcement regarding this star will probably be made within a few days from now. Within a month releases of the new brand will be under way, through Sawyer, Inc.

Booking "Cabiria"

Much Territory Already Disposed of, with a Strong Demand Still Manifested.

TWENTY states have either been sold outright or booking rights granted on "Cabiria" and active negotiations now in progress promise that two or three weeks will see the whole country contracted for.

Werba & Luescher, Inc., the widely-known theatrical firm who assisted Harry R. Raver in the exploitation and routing of the eighteen "Cabiria" companies, will take care of the bookings in New York and New Jersey. Their office is in the New York Theater Building.

Sol Lesser, the film impresario of the Pacific Coast, will place the super-feature in that territory. He has reported a heavy demand for it and quotes figures from theater owners attesting that it has drawn box-office receipts unprecedented by any other motion picture.

W. E. Greene, the New England exchange man, and one thoroughly experienced and highly respected throughout his section, has been intrusted with the New England bookings, to be directed from Greene's office at No. 162 Tremont street, Boston.

Fresh from three months of big success as field manager of the New England "Cabiria" shows, Frank Samuels has just gone to Chicago to begin operations in Illinois, Wisconsin and Indiana. Mr. Samuels has a limitless acquaintance with exhibitors throughout the country. He will be particularly remembered for his association with both the first and second Motion Picture Expositions in Grand Central Palace in a managerial capacity.

Harry Bryan will take care of Eastern Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland and the District of Columbia from offices at 1316 Vine street, Philadelphia. Mr. Bryan, a one-time theatrical man, has gained wide and deep experience as manager of rental offices for W. H. Swanson, George Kleine, All Star Film Rental Co. of New York and others.

Louisiana and Mississippi rights have been sold to Herman Fichtenberg, the owner of a chain of big theaters. The price paid, though not disproportionate considering merit, was far higher than was ever paid in that territory for film. Mr. Fichtenberg, actuated by motives of pride as well as a shrewd business acumen, foresaw that the presentation of "Cabiria" in his houses would bring great prestige.

Of interest to exhibitors having small houses is Harry R. Raver's announcement that, if necessary, the feature may be run as a serial over several days. This opens the way to the most obscure exhibitor to at some time be able to book the film, whose length possibly would interfere with its exhibition in one performance.

MISS WOODRUFF HELPS SHOW GIRLS.

Eleanor Woodruff, the Pathe leading woman, is busily engaged in a very worthy work. Owing to the hard times in the theatrical business, she found that a great many show girls were unable to secure employment and some of them were really destitute. Miss Woodruff formed a club of fifteen of the most needy and has made it her business to get them located. She has succeeded beyond her expectations and has already placed ten or eleven of the girls and hopes before long to be equally successful with the others. Such practical charity is worth emulating.

"ALCO" KANE SEEING THINGS.

After a trip in the interests of Alco through Pennsylvania, Michigan, Illinois and Minnesota, Robert T. Kane, supervisor of exchanges for the Alco Film Corporation, has just returned to the city. He starts on a trip to other exchanges within a few days. Mr. Kane's mission is to carry Alco ideas to exhibitors and exchange men. He keeps the various exchanges in constant co-operation with one another and with the parent company in New York.

Mr. Kane gave a general idea of film conditions in the sections of the country visited. "Those of our exchanges which I visited reported the constant demand for return dates in the cases of 'The Nightingale' and 'Salomy Jane.' It is, of course, as a result of this demand that Augustus Thomas is preparing to put Miss Barrymore in two more plays which he is writing for her. And the California Motion Picture Corporation, in response to the same demand, will follow 'Salomy Jane' with other plays of the real West.

"There is a big demand over the country for Western plays. But they must not be such as many producers have offered in the past. People want no idea of Western life conceived on Broadway. It must be the West as it is today, or the West as it was in the past generation."

Can't Trick Uncle Sam

In Addition to Normal Duty Foreign Made Positives of American Negatives Are Assessed Market Value When Offered for Entry.

EFFORTS on the part of importers to secure free entry of moving picture films brought here from abroad, on the ground that they are strictly of American production, whereas, in reality, they are positive films manufactured in Europe from American-made negatives, will lead to their being assessed with the market value of the film of this country, in addition to the duty normally placed on such importants, before they will be released. Instructions to take such action have been sent to all officers and collectors of customs in a letter from Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Andrew J. Peters, who is in charge of the Division of Customs, as follows:

"Recent investigations show that in many instances moving picture films have been entered free of duty of American origin when they were, in fact, manufactured abroad from negatives exported from the United States.

"From statements made by leading film manufacturers in the United States it is learned that in most cases no positive prints are shipped abroad, the negative only being shipped and the positives made in Europe. In cases where positive prints are shipped to Europe they are leased or sold with the understanding that the films are not to be resold or shipped back to the United States.

"In view of the foregoing, you are instructed to examine carefully all moving picture films claimed to be free of duty under paragraph 404 of the tariff act and to refuse free entry in case of doubt unless satisfactory evidence shall be produced as to the American origin of the film. In cases where films of foreign origin are fraudulently invoiced as of American manufacture, they will be released only upon payment of the home value thereof, plus the duty."

Mutual Company vs. Ohio Commission

Federal Court Calendars Hearing for December 7—Will Decide Constitutionality of State Censorship.

THE Supreme Court of the United States will, on Monday, December 7, listen to the arguments in the case of the Mutual Film Corporation against the Industrial Commission of the State of Ohio, its motion to advance the case out of its regular order on the docket on account of the special and peculiar circumstances which exist in connection therewith having been granted. This case, which comes to the Supreme Court on an appeal, was brought to test the constitutionality, both under the constitution of the United States and of the State of Ohio, of an act passed by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio on April 16, 1913, which created a board of censors of motion picture films.

The brief, in which the motion to advance the case was made, states that it is of greatest importance, not simply to persons who are engaged in the manufacture, distribution and exhibition of motion picture films, but also to the millions of people in the United States who go daily to see exhibitions, that the question as to whether any government authority can constitutionally impose a censorship of motion picture films should be settled once and for all by the decision of the Supreme Court.

It is further stated that similar laws have been passed and are the subject of litigation in Kansas, Pennsylvania and Illinois, and the Congress of the United States and the legislatures of many states are considering the enactment of similar laws.

ROLFE TO PRODUCE "SATAN SANDERSON."

B. A. Rolfe Photoplays, Inc., has decided upon the next photoplay production to be released by Alco after Mabel Taliaferro in "The Three of Us." This is Hallie Erminie Rives' well-known novel, "Satan Sanderson." The novel was dramatized and was played successfully in the legitimate over the country for two years. A well-known feminine star, whose name is to be made known later, will play the chief feminine role, Jessica.

ALLIANCE ADDS TO ITS LIST OF EXCHANGES.

The Celebrated Film Players Co., of Chicago, which handles the Alliance Programme in Illinois, owing to the great success of the Alliance features has added Indiana to its territory. The Zenith Feature Film Co., of Duluth, one of the largest film concerns in the Northwest, has just signed contracts to exclusively control the Alliance output in Minnesota, Wisconsin, and North and South Dakota.

Earl Metcalfe

"EARL METCALFE, Lubin Company," is the curt way he would declare or sign himself, but to those who know him he is styled "The first Earl of Lubinville" (for as such he is known at the Lubin Studio in Philadelphia). This title we have discovered is not alone euphonious, for in reality Earl Metcalfe comes from a noble family in England, but, as we are Americans Earl Metcalfe as an American and who is proud of the fact that he can claim the glorious State of Kentucky as his home.

Earl Metcalfe.

Mr. Metcalfe deserted the legitimate stage three years ago after scorning offers to appear in pictures as many other actors had done. He joined the forces of the Lubin Company, and after starting at the bottom of the ladder has forced himself to the front until now he is known throughout the country as one of Lubin's favorite leading men.

It does not often happen that a man so well endowed with good looks chooses to obscure them in character makeups as is Metcalfe's preference, but the delineation of the unusual in human nature appeals strongly to the young Lubin actor (for he is really only 25), and it is in such roles that he has won his greatest spurs with the moving picture fans. He has played in big city stock companies, was leading man for Stella Hammerstein and juvenile man for Zelda Sears in New York City. He is a favorite in Indianapolis, Memphis, Duluth, St. Paul, Cincinnati, Chicago and New York City, where he gained great popularity for his conscientious and excellent work while playing in stock companies. Versatility is his main asset. The motion picture public has been delighted to see him in a variety of widely different roles. Mr. Metcalfe being ably proficient in any type ranging from a young college boy to a decrepit old man. Besides being an actor of unquestionable ability, personality and good looks, Metcalfe is also a short story writer of note, having several stories in popular magazines to his credit, but, first of all he is one of the Lubin Company's very best and most popular men at their eastern studio in Philadelphia.

MOTION PICTURES KILLING SALOON BUSINESS.

Saloonmen had time to talk on Election Day when the barrooms were closed in Duluth, Minn., and a reporter for a local paper set out to find the relation of the moving picture to the saloon business. A Michigan street saloon keeper said that business was "rotten." He was asked if he thought the moving picture shows were to blame.

"They certainly are," he replied. "I got to wondering where all the boys were that used to be in here. I laid it up to hard times, but when I see the same lads that used to come down to my place nearly every night going to picture shows, I know it isn't that.

"When we had mechanical pianos in the saloons it wasn't so bad. But they took our music away, and I guess the 'movies' have reaped the benefit. They certainly have put a crimp in our business."

A Duluth social worker agreed with him. "The man who used to loaf away his evenings around a saloon had found that by spending a great deal less on liquor, he can make an evening pass much more pleasantly," said he. "There was no organized work that I know of to bring this result. It just naturally came.

"A mission gospel worker in another city first called my attention to it. He said that in his city, the loafing had decreased thirty per cent. I have inquired and investigated here in Duluth, and I found men whom I knew to be habitual leaners on the saloon rail, seated in the theater and watching the pictures."

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

By G. P. von Harleman.

FROM authoritative source I am informed that it is the intention of Chief of Police Gleason and the judiciary committee of the Chicago City Council to introduce an ordinance to segregate men and women in moving picture theaters.

Complaints from Chief Gleason that "mashers" and women "parasites" are frequenting picture shows impels the judiciary committee to seek an ordinance that will place lone men in one section of a moving picture theater, unescorted women in another section, and men and women who accompany each other, in a third section of the house. Children, however, will have the run of the place. Chief Gleason states that many mothers are complaining to the police department that their daughters are being annoyed when visiting moving picture theaters alone, and there are other complaints too, he says, that would make a segregation of the sexes desirable.

An ordinance of this kind, if carried through, certainly will give the moving picture business a "black eye" in Chicago. It will make a most unfavorable impression on the public. It will place moving pictures among undesirable entertainments that necessitate police restrictions. Nice people certainly will not stand for being sorted out like cattle in a place where they have to pay for their entertainment. The segregation of men and women at public bathing beaches last summer brought on a storm of protest and resentment from the people of Chicago. But just think what a difference there is between a public bathing beach, which is a gift from the city to the people, and a moving picture theater, which is a place bidding for public favor at a monetary consideration! People might overlook the distasteful rules of a public bathing beach considering the benefits it gives them, but will they overlook the same arrangements if there is an admission to pay? That might account for the reason that no segregation was made last summer at the Wilson and other pay-admission beaches in Chicago.

However, it is a well-known fact that if there is a possibility, somebody will start a crusade on the moving pictures. They get it coming and going. If it isn't one thing it is another. Last time it was the ventilating ordinance, and exhibitors of Chicago had their hands full for quite a while. But this new proposed ordinance will put any past ordinances in the shade. I consider it very unjust. Conditions in moving picture theaters in Chicago do not justify such a drastic action. We will admit that there are some undesirable picture houses in the city, but should the hundreds of well conducted moving picture theaters in Chicago suffer on account of the undesirable management of a few? Exhibitors who own well conducted and respectable houses should use all their influence to kill any such detrimental ordinance. It is an insult to the business!

"Adults Only" Permits Withdrawn.

That the "Adults Only" ordinance should be abused was no surprise to the writer. I predicted this very thing in one of my letters, when the ordinance was proposed last summer.

The Chicago board of censorship, last week, withdrew a number of the permits for showing so-called features for adults only. The privilege has been misused. Undesirable exhibitors playing on the baser qualities of their patrons have been advertising any old kind of subject, with a promising title, as a feature "absolutely not to be shown to children under 21 years of age." We might call this obtaining money under false pretenses, though I think the patron deserved to get "stuck" if the picture did not come up to his vile expectations. However, it was a practice objected to by the censor board.

Another thing. We have been told that some of our feature film exchanges, on the strength of a permit to show questionable pictures, tried to "slip over" a number of sensational scenes in order to "make good" with their exhibitor-customers—scenes that they had never submitted to the censor board. Their punishment for this little trick was the elimination of the entire production in the city of Chicago.

When touching on the subject of censorship, I would like to call attention to the number of low-down amusement dives that are allowed to operate on South State street, between Van Buren and Harrison streets. These places are not exhibiting motion pictures. The character of the entertainment does not have to be emphasized for "adults only." The prominent lobby display of lascivious photographs is a sufficient advertisement. Of course, no small children are admitted, but many young boys between 15 and 20 can be seen flocking around these "theaters."

The "Standard" Program.

A new program—a fourth or fifth faction, whatever you may call it—has been launched this week in Chicago. This new combination is called the Standard Program Association, and is a consolidation of a number of feature film exchanges throughout the country.

Joseph Hopp, of the Union Film Co., is the promoter of this new enterprise. Mr. Hopp has made the following statement to the Western representative of the Moving Picture World, with regard to the formation and the purpose of the Standard Program:

The Standard Program Association is an exchange organization for the purpose of establishing a close mutuality between the exchanges and a distributing company. The Standard Program Association is a corporation under the laws of the State of Illinois. The distributing agency will be located in New York, and will be called the Standard Polyscope Corporation. The officers of the Standard Program Association are: Joseph Hopp, Chicago, president; Nelson Evans and D. S. Markowitz, of Los Angeles, vice-presidents; E. T. Peter, Dallas, Tex., secretary, and Sam Werner, of St. Louis, treasurer.

The above also constitute the board of directors. The headquarters of the Standard Program Association is Chicago. The location of the distributing company, as previously mentioned, is New York. Officers and directors are not yet for publication, but Mr. Hopp tells us they are people of considerable means and influence.

The Standard Program will start with twenty reels a week. It will consist of one three-reel subject, four two-reel, and nine one-reel subjects. Instead of daily releases the Standard output will be released once a week so as to permit the exchanges to make the releases of subjects in a way that is most suited to the conditions of their territory. Further particulars with regard to the Standard Program will be given in a coming issue of the Moving Picture World.

Selig's Chicago Studio Scene of Great Activity.

The big Chicago studio of the Selig Polyscope Co., out on Western avenue, near Irving Park boulevard, which was practically closed for production last summer, is now fairly boiling with producing activity. Frankly, the studio kettle began to boil with the production of the suffrage film, "Your Girl and Mine," and now other important productions are underway. Tyrone Power, unquestionably one of the greatest actors appearing on the stage today, will play the leading part in "A Texas Steer," a new production which is being filmed under the supervision of Giles Warren, who directed the production of "Your Girl and Mine."

The next thing on the calendar, after the completion of this picture, is a film version of "The Servant in the House."

Big productions, requiring chiefly interiors, hereafter are to be the policy of the Chicago studio. From the western studio will come the regular schedule releases and certain features, such as "The Rosary" and "The Carpet from Bagdad," but the emphasis on features will be made here, where some especially impressive things are contemplated.

Indianapolis Theaters Raise Admission to Ten Cents.

F. R. Martin, representing the Abo Feature Film Co., made a trip to Indianapolis last week, and on his return tells us a few interesting things about conditions there.

Dr. J. M. Rhoades, president of the Indiana M. P. Association, and A. C. Zaring, secretary and treasurer of the State League, and with Dr. Rhoades partner in the Rhoades-Zaring Amusement Co., have started a movement to increase admission in moving picture theaters in Indianapolis from five to 10 cents. The Rhoades-Zaring Amusement Co. operates eight prominent theaters in Indianapolis, including the North Star, the Delight and the Garrick. The admission was raised to 10 cents in all these theaters, and, as Indianapolis has been a "five-cent" town for many years, it was considered quite an experiment. The ten cent admission was first tried out in two of the Rhoades-Zaring theaters once a week, and then when it proved successful, twice a week. The result was so encouraging, that the Rhoades-Zaring Amusement Co. adopted a ten cent policy for all of their houses. Other exhibitors in Indianapolis soon followed suit, and now the great majority of moving picture theaters in the town are charging 10 cents for admission.

General conditions have not been the very best in Indianapolis. There has been too much unfair competition. Exhibitors would try to cut each other's throats, instead of working together for mutual benefit. One exhibitor was running seven reels for a nickel to kill a house across the street which was using vaudeville acts. One man who owns three theaters is said to have given transfers to all of his houses, so the patrons could see three shows in this way for five cents. Another undesirable thing is the great profusion of lurid and sensational posters, used even by the better class theaters. Mr. Martin states that Indianapolis has now 60 moving picture theaters, the majority of which he believes are using Paramount and General service.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Jones, Linick & Schaefer are going to share the profits of their theater enterprises with the public in the form of coupons. Each coupon is worth one cent in theater trade. Thusly, 10 coupons will admit you free to the Orpheum, and 25 coupons to the Studebaker. The trading stamps idea is getting popular.

* * *

Another coupon scheme is "Scrip." "A mile in travel for a dollar in trade." We don't want our patrons to travel, do we?

George Kleine sent a letter, last week, to the 300 or more principals of public schools in Chicago. The letter called attention to the educational features of "Julius Caesar," and suggested that the schools might co-operate with the exhibitors for children's matinees.

Roger C. Wittenburg, proprietor of the Rogers Theater, located at Fullerton and Maplewood avenues, called at the Chicago office of the Moving Picture World recently. The Rogers is a house of 500 seating capacity, using Paramount and General service. Mr. Wittenburg states that in order to ascertain the preference of his patrons to serial pictures or feature productions, a vote by a printed ballot was taken at the theater. The result of this voting showed a proportion of three to one in favor of the big feature productions.

Mary Ryan, who is now playing leading woman in "On Trial" at the Candler Theater in New York, will take the leading part in George Kleine's film production, "Stop Thief." Miss Ryan is well known here in Chicago, being for many years the leading woman in the Dearborn Stock Co. at the old Dearborn Theater, now the Garrick. The leading man in the picture production will be Harry Mestayer, who took the leading part in the play at Cohan's Grand in Chicago, under the management of Cohan & Harris.

F. E. Samuels, whose name for the two last years is well known in connection with the moving picture expositions in New York City, paid a pleasant call to the World office. Mr. Samuels announced that he is opening offices in Suite 809-11 Schiller Bldg., and will handle "Cabiria" for Illinois, Wisconsin and Indiana, for the Itala Film Co. of America.

Thomas P. Keyes, alleged confidence game man, was found guilty of operating a confidence game by a jury in Judge Brentano's court, last week. He was charged with having fleeced Rudolph Rieger out of $600 in a moving picture theater deal. In a contract entered into Rieger was to obtain one-fourth interest in a moving picture theater at Paw Paw, Mich., by the payment of $600 and was to receive $25 a week salary as manager of it.

Otto N. Raths, part owner of the Gaiety Theater, in St. Paul, Minn., paid a pleasant call at the World office last week. Mr. Raths stated that on Thanksgiving day he will open the Ideal Theater, in South St. Paul, Minn. This theater seats 650 people, and an admission of 10 cents will be charged for two acts of vaudeville and moving pictures. Mr. Raths also stated that the governor of Minnesota, and his staff, together with the mayor and councilmen of St. Paul and Minneapolis, will participate in the opening.

Martin Sachs, manager of the Vitagraph Theater, 3133-41 Lincoln avenue, and also of the Biograph Theater, at 2433-43 Lincoln avenue, called at the World office last week, and subscribed for the paper. These two houses each seat 1,000 people, and charge 10 cents admission for six reels of General Film Service and features. The Vitagraph and Biograph theaters are both owned by Lubliner & Trinz.

FARNUM AND EDESON WITH BOX OFFICE.

William Farnum has been engaged to play the title role in "Samson" for the Box Office Attractions Company and Robert Edeson will take the principal part in "The Girl I Left Behind Me." Both players are stars of the first magnitude.

REICHENBACH CLOSES WITH LASKY.

Harry L. Reichenbach, who has handled the publicity for the Jesse Lasky Feature Plays Company since the organization of that concern, has resigned to seek wider fields for his energies. Mr. Reichenbach is one of the most resourceful publicity men connected with the motion picture business and one of the hardest workers. While with the Lasky company he has introduced many novel publiicty features calculated to obtain the widest notoriety for the product of that concern and few press representatives can produce a more interesting or more voluminous "scrap book" that has been compiled by the publicity department of Lasky's. Mr. Reichenbach is considering several interesting offers for his services.

MOTION PICTURES AT CHURCHILL'S.

New York's most famous restaurant and cabaret has installed motion pictures as an added attraction. Patrons of Churchill's, Broadway and 49th street, were surprised on Monday evening, November 16, when upon a large "Day and Night" screen on the west end of the cafe a clearly defined picture appeared, notwithstanding that the lights of the big dining room were on in full strength. A Power 6A is used for projection and "that Universal program" is drawn upon for the pictures.

EAGLE FEATURE CO., INC., BANKRUPTCY.

The Eagle Feature Film Company, Inc., which is engaged in the business of leasing photoplays to motion picture exhibitors, with offices at 71 West Twenty-third street, is in bankruptcy. An involuntary petition in bankruptcy was filed against the corporation by Graham & Stevenson, attorneys for these creditors: Charles J. Swan, former treasurer of the company, on a claim of $620 for back salary; the Schonbar Printing Company, supplies furnished, $12, and Charles H. Streimer, $735.

NEW SAWYER ZONE OFFICERS.

During the past week zone offices for Sawyer, Inc., have been opened in Atlanta, Ga., and Nashville, Tenn., for the handling of their features in the South. The Georgia office is under the name of Southern Sawyer Film Mart, and offices have been taken on the fourth floor of the Forsyth Building. Arrangements are under way by which this office will have the only private projecting room in the South, its decorations being modeled on the same line as the Sawyer Pompeiian projecting room at 1600 Broadway. This will be in the basement of the Forsyth Building.

The Nashville office will be the Anderson Film Exchange, in the First National Bank Building. Mr. Harry Anderson is the manager. He is a well-known advertising man through the South, and was the campaign manager for the Democratic State Committee in Tennessee, which just elected its candidate, General Rye, as governor. The territory to be covered by the Nashville zone will be the states of Kentucky, Tennessee and Mississippi. The Atlanta office will supply South Carolina, Georgia, Florida and Alabama.

W. A. Atkinson, assistant general manager of Sawyer, Inc., started during the middle of the week for a six or seven weeks' trip to the Pacific Coast, to visit Sawyer zone offices already in existence, and to establish new ones. His route, in order, will be Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Chicago, Minneapolis, Omaha, Kansas City, Denver, Salt Lake City, Los Angeles and San Francisco, the return trip to be made via Portland, Seattle and Vancouver, through the principal cities of the Canadian Northwest, and back to New York via Winnipeg and Montreal.

PLAY BROKERS SUE CRAFT AND OTHERS.

"When London Sleeps," the three-act drama by Charles Darrell, which was produced with artistic and financial success on the Continent and in the principal cities in this country a few seasons ago, is the basis of an action on file in the United States District Court against Pliny P. Craft and the Exclusive Features, Inc.

Darcy & Wolford, Inc., leasers of plays and dramatic productions, the complainants in the action, allege that the value of the dramatic production is being lessened materially by reason of the fact that the defendants are presenting the play in pictures. The plaintiff contends it owns the rights to the production and asserts the moving picture rights to the drama have not been granted to the film company.

Injunctive relief and an accounting of the profits which it is claimed have accrued to the defendants by reason of the alleged infringement is sought in the suit.

Doings at Los Angeles.

ARTICLES of incorporation have been filed in the sum of $50,000 by the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company, with Oliver Morosco at its head, and Frank Garbutt, Charles F. Eyton and Melodile Garbutt as its backers.

This important alliance of big legitimate producers and well known picture men has created some mild excitement here. The new concern will probably do its work at the new Bosworth studios. It has not yet been settled as to whether the two producers will work together or whether Morosco will only release his own plays through Garbutt's connection with Paramount, but there will be some connection between these two veteran managers.

Charles Eyton will take care of the moving picture end of Mr. Morosco's business in the west, while the well-known magnate will oversee the whole business, as well as his extensive theatrical interests. The new firm will start production as soon as possible of a well-known and much sought after play, "The Bird of Paradise," with an all-star cast.

"Cabiria," really too well known for criticism, ran another period at Trinity auditorium with Manager L. E. Behymer wearing a satisfied smile as the mobs poured into the big theater. This great film is now being shown for a short time at the Venice Auditorium, an amusement resort playhouse recently leased and reopened by Harry Middleton, a well-known theatrical man. He is booking such big features and making a business where before there was but a small one. "Cabiria" was well liked at the beach, the large theater playing to full houses at each running.

More heads of corporations have been here this week than ever before in the history of the moving picture business. Carl Laemmle, head of the Universal Film Manufacturing Co., was welcomed on Tuesday afternoon by all the employees of the West Coast studios in Hollywood. The manager of the big concern expressed his approval of the plant and its progress and said that the prospects for the coming year were even better than they were several months ago. Mr. Bernstein accompanied the big man out to the ranch, where an inspection trip was made of the new buildings. Mr. Laemmle will plan the production of some new and spectacular plays, the names of which he is not ready to announce.

Jesse L. Lasky has been here nearly a week and at the studio he told of wonderful new things for the western plant. In the first place he secured the remaining portion of the block on which the studio is located. Immediately, even before the deed had been folded and delivered, workers started on the construction of the new 100x75-foot glass enclosed stage. A whole block adjoining the Lasky grounds has also been leased for big scenes so that the company will not have to be transported afar to get settings. In addition to this general improvements are under way, the bulk of which consists of new dressing rooms, enlarged laboratory, mechanical department, wardrobe room, and minor places used in the production of big pictures.

Here are a few of the stars that Mr. Lasky has engaged to come out and play in well-known productions. Edith Taliaferro has already started in "Merely Mary Ann"; Marguerite Clarke will be seen in the well-known play "The Goose Girl"; Mary Nash will play "The Woman"; Louis Mann in "Elevating a Husband"; Edna Goodrich will soon be here to play the star part in some well-known play, and Dustin Farnum is busy with "Cameo Kirby." House Peters, who played the lead in the golden west girl story is now a permanent member of this company. Frederick Thompson came from the east to direct, and Mr. Lasky secured George H. Melford, ex-director of Kalem, who will handle another company. This studio is now one of the biggest and best, and is a lively place, and the prospects for the winter are quite promising. Mr. Lasky said, when asked about the war: "No, the war holds no fears for us, we are now preparing for peace, and it is keeping up pretty busy, too."

And out at the Selig headquarters, there is a man present who is about the busiest film maker in the land. The head of that company which bears his name, arrived from the east and is looking after the western interests. Big and new things are in the air and Mr. Selig promises a whirlwind of releases that will make them all sit up and ask for more. Clune's Broadway theater is running an exclusive Selig program in which no set of players appears twice. The first picture of the program shows Kathlyn Williams, Charles Clary and their players, while the next featured are Tom Mix and his western folk. The next release to be shown is the Tom Santchi and Bessie Eyton company and the last picture on the program is a mixed company of well-known Seligites. The picture goers here seem to like the bill, as all are made in this city, and the players are seen but once on the same bill.

Little Billy Jacobs has returned to the fold of Ford Sterling. Fred Balshofer secured the little man a few days ago and now Robert Thornby, the "child director" (directing children) will be busy putting out some new releases for the kid program.

Even publicity experts get sick. Don Meaney of the Universal was nearly caught by a pneumonia germ, but a week in bed under the care of a physician has put the writer back into the race.

Ever since Raymond West put on a fairy story at the Ince studios, a queer and mysterious happening has three times visited the place. As if some filmy fairy had poured a potion of love in the drinks served at the cafe in the canyon, three couples have been mortally wounded by sharp darts from the bow of Captain Cupid. The latest to fall were Superintendent E. H. Allen and pretty "Pinkie" Margaret Thompson, leading lady of Inceville. This alliance in filmland powers was caused by the rescue of Miss Thompson some time ago at the beach studio. Since that event, the two have been constant companions, and now—Well, the company players chipped in and the new bungalow home is boasting of a handsome silver service. We all certainly express our hearty approval, and send on the well wishes.

William Garwood, formerly a star of the Majestic, and later a featured man at the American, has departed for New York to play with one of the Imp companies. The west honestly hates to see Billy leave, but as he has to go, "bon voyage" and when he gets there, good luck.

Pathe Lehrman and his L-KO company has four directors, Rube Miller, George Nichols, Harry Edwards and the comical manager-director. Some new and startling comedies are being put on here.

Alvarez Taylor, first name alias William, has joined Carlyle Blackwell at the Favorite Players studio and will direct the famous star. Taylor was with the Ince forces and later played leads with the Vitagraph under Sturgeon, being featured in "Captain Alvarez." He is now in full charge of the new studio, and is working on "The Last Chapter."

Harry Pollard has secured a new company and taken them to Santa Barbara with him. Among the well-known players who will be up north are Joe Singleton, Robyn Adair, Ed Langley, Mrs. Chance Ward and others. Pollard will start on a four-reel feature. Margarita Fischer will be seen in her own company.

Met Bessie Barriscale out at the Ince camp while she was working in the big feature story written by the manager of the New York company. She is well satisfied and is glad to be in the films. She said "At first I was rather scared when they told me to do thrilling things, but since I have been thrown around so much I am not afraid and there is nothing that can stump me, but I never yet have been thrown down a cliff and I still have that to do."

Rollin S. Sturgeon and his company has gone to Bear Valley to wait for the first snows of the season. They may have to wait a week and a month may pass before the filmy comforter blankets the hills and valleys. Artistic settings and wonderful locations are being discovered while the snow is being waited for.

The Oz Co. ceased production last Saturday, turning over the studio to the Tiffany concern, which is now working with Herbert Brenon, Mrs. Leslie Carter, and J. Farrel MacDonald, who directed Oz films. He has the part opposite Mrs. Carter, that of the heavy. The Oz players have disbanded and are going with other concerns. The leading lady, Violet MacMillan is as yet uncertain where she will go, but a good place will be hers when she does decide. The other players have joined several companies, and are again at work.

Fund for Homeless Belgians

Opportunity for Theater Managers to Assist in a Worthy Movement Deserving of Widespread Support.

THE following paragraphs reprinted from the literature being distributed by the Honorary Committee of the Dollar Christmas Fund for Homeless Belgians suggest a way in which moving picture theater managers can assist in securing contributions for the relief of the awful suffering, chiefly among women and children, due to the war in Europe.

The idea of appealing to picture theaters was suggested to the committee by Manager Tupper of the Fredonia Opera House, Fredonia, N. Y., who donated the net proceeds of one day to the fund.

"In view of the countless appeals both national and local which have been made to American sympathy in behalf of the victims of the war, one can only plead the immeasurable extent and pathos of the Belgian tragedy to warrant the addition of still another to the list. And the poignant sorrow of the situation is not lessened by the thought that the sum total of all the funds collected here and in Europe can only in a very small part—so vast and increasing is the need—assuage the sufferings of Belgium's unhappy people.

"To avert starvation amongst the Belgian refugees this winter is the special object of the dollar Christmas fund.

"To secure this object more effectively it has already been arranged to co-operate with the Shilling Christmas Fund of London which has collected for the same purpose nearly $400,000.

"The co-operation of the two funds in joint organization secures absolutely one great end:

"Economy in administration and the avoidance of duplication and overlapping. Every cent contributed goes direct to the Belgians.

"The Shilling Fund with which we are allied has the guidance of the members of the Belgian Government and the Belgian Minister in London.

"Unless otherwise desired, names of contributors are published in London as well as New York.

"Mr. Henry Clews, of Henry Clews & Co., bankers, Broad street, New York, is the treasurer. All checks should be made payable to him.

"Today hundreds of thousands of Belgians are homeless and penniless refugees. Thousands of civilians have met a miserable death. The whole apparatus of economic life in field or factory or office has been wrecked and ruined so that the future of Belgium is altogether beyond prophecy."

As this committee has only a few weeks in which to secure funds before Christmas, any action taken should be immediate. Literature and further information may be secured by addressing Percy S. Bullen, secretary, 66 Broadway, New York City. Posters for use in front of theater and in lobby will be furnished to any theaters that desire to assist the fund by contributing any part of their receipts. Many different organizations have been soliciting funds in aid of the war victims, but every dollar will be needed. All remittances should be sent direct to Henry Clews, treasurer, Henry Clews & Co., bankers, Broad street, New York.

ARTHUR S. KANE WITH WORLD FILM CORPORATION.

Arthur S. Kane, formerly general manager of the Eclectic Film Company, has been appointed assistant general manager of the World Film Corporation and will take up his duties as Lewis J. Selznick's right-hand man on November 30th.

He has the distinction of being the first special representative the General Film Company ever had. He managed branches in Seattle, St. Louis and New York City. He was then made assistant to Frank L. Dyer, then president of the General Film Company. For many years he made his home in Topeka, Kan., and before coming East he was associated with O. T. Crawford, the well-known theatrical and film man of St. Louis. While in the firm of Crawford & Kane, a concern which controlled many theatres throughout the Middle West, he became interested in motion pictures. He was a newspaper man for some time, starting his career on the Topeka Capital. He then went to the Kansas City Star and was later made sporting editor of the Kansas City Times.

Thanks to the unfaltering nerve of J. M. Downie, one of the Universal Animated Weekly cameramen now in the European war zone, the Universal patrons will be given, in the way of war scenes showing the fall of Antwerp, an absolute scoop. These scenes will be compiled into a one-reel special film and will be released immediately. Among those scenes, which give an intimate idea of the siege of the famous Belgium city, Antwerp, are some which show the 4.7-inch guns in an armored train; these scenes are unique and unusually interesting.

Though the risks which Mr. Downie took to get these scenes cannot be discounted, it is likely that the film would not have ben secured if good fortune, in the guise of luck, had not played a winning hand for the cemeraman. Acting on his own judgment, Downie stayed in the crumbling city up to within a few hours of the total investment of the city by Germans. Every avenue of escape was closed up immediately after his departure. It is believed that the Animated cameraman is the only one who was able to photograph scenes of the siege. If there were others who took scenes they would have been unable to pass through the lines after Downie left.

Incidentally, Mr. Downie enjoys a wide circle of friends among the Belgium and French armies. He was not only allowed to move pretty much as he pleased, but some of the army officers even assisted him, at times, in moving his camera and securing passage through restricted districts.

Animated cameramen are scattered over Europe at the present time and are photographing everything possible under the present restrictions. Many of them are taking big chances, as the present release will indicate. Special releases of war film will be given the Universal public every week or so.

WANTS PROGRESSIVE TO GIVE ACCOUNTING.

Eric L. Smith, claiming to be a stockholder of the Progressive Motion Picture Corporation, the studio of which is located at City Island, New York, on ex parte affidavits, obtained from Justice Pendleton in the Supreme Court an order to "show cause" against the corporation and John Borg, Edward H. Power and Harry H. Carey, why a receiver should not be appointed for the corporation. He claims that the interests of the corporation was neglected in that a small judgment obtained by Mrs. Ella J. Carey was allowed to be taken by default; that part of a film entitled "McVeagh of the South Seas," for which the Alliance Film Co. was to pay $10,000 on November 9, was missing, that the United Booking Co. has money from royalties due on "The Master Cracksman," "Busy Izzy" and "His Partner's Conscience," and that an accounting of all the affairs of the corporation would be a benefit to all the stockholders, whom he invites to join him in his action.

The matter was on the calendar of Part 1 of the Supreme Court for argument on Monday, but it was adjourned until November 24.

Pictures for School Children

Movement in Louisville to Provide Suitable Programs for Pupils to Be Shown at Theaters Saturday Mornings.

A MOTION picture development in Louisville, Ky., which is the first step in that city toward introduction of films into the public schools, and which is a very desirable Saturday morning revenue producer, has just taken form. The Parent-Teacher League, an organization of public school teachers, and the parents of the children they have in charge, has taken the initiative in the movement of which the school children and the Mary Anderson moving picture theater are the beneficiaries. The Louisville Board of Education has given its endorsement to the plan, and it has got under way with every indication of proving thoroughly satisfactory to all concerned.

The idea, primarily, is that the educational value of many of the current films may be utilized on Saturday morning when the children are out of school, and that a board of censors representing the parents and teachers of the children shall pass upon the merits of the program. This removes the causes for reluctance of mothers to permit their small children to attend the theater, for it insures pictures which cannot have any ill effects. The first time it was tried in Louisville 1,000 children and their elders were divided between two performances and they paid five or ten cents admission, according to their ages. The second performance, or the second two performances, repeated the first.

This movement in Louisville has been confined to the theater named to date, and, it is said, many of the hundreds of children who attended, got their first glimpse of motion pictures. It is suggested that there is enough of this business possible to be divided among all the motion picture theaters in town, and that neighboring boards of censors can pass on the programs offered on Saturday mornings by other playhouses, thus making it easy for children in all parts of the city to profit by the arrangement. It is certain that the Louisville experiment will be watched by picture show men in other cities, and that similar systems will be worked out there.

To go back to the beginning in Louisville, the idea is credited to Mrs. Fred Levy, wife of a prominent merchant, member of the Board of Park Commissioners and one of the city's public-spirited men. She was in New York last summer and there broached the subject to A. Paul Keith, son of the late B. F. Keith. She made special reference to Louisville, where the Keith house was the Mary Garden theater. Mr. Keith gave immediate approval and promised co-operation. On returning to Louisville Mrs. Levy took the project up with Lee Goldberg, manager of the Mary Anderson theater, which had just been given over to motion pictures, since the Keith interests gave it up for the larger National theater. Mr. Goldberg saw the possibilities and agreed to co-operate.

Mrs. Levy next interested Mrs. Herbert Mengel and Mrs. L. A. Rosenbaum who, like her, were members of the Parent-Teacher Association of the Gavin H. Cochran school. That body approved, and the three constituted a committee to refer the proposition to the Board of Education. The board, having unhesitatingly approved, the committee then talked with representatives of other Parent-Teacher Associations, of which there is one for each of the thirty-two schools, finding favor everywhere, and it is declared to be an assured fact that when the central body, the Parent-Teacher League, holds its next meeting, another unqualified endorsement will be received.

So on Saturday morning, October 10, the first "especially censored" program was given at the Mary Anderson theater, the first performance beginning at 10 o'clock and the second at 11:15 o'clock. The newspapers previously had carried considerable stories on the project when the matter was presented to the Board of Education. Again on the morning of the first exhibition there were more stories and on the day afterward detailed accounts served further to acquaint all the people of Louisville with what was going on. The following Saturday, owing to this publicity, which was further increased by dodgers distributed among members of the various Parent-Teacher Associations, larger audiences than greeted the first programs were entertained and instructed.

The program for the first day's performances consisted of four pictures. Browning's "Pied Piper of Hamelin;" the fairy tale, "The Three Bears;" the historical-educational feature, "How Washington Crossed the Delaware," and the pretty little, very moral comedy, "Little Billy's Triumph." The second program on October 17 consisted of the well-known "Little Red Riding Hood," "Signing the Declaration of Independence," "Wild Birds at Home" and a juvenile comedy.

For the present Mesdames Levy, Mengel and Rosenbaum constitute the Board of Censors. Some time during the week Mr. Goldberg submits, at a special private showing, a number of pictures which seem to him to fill the requirements. Up to now none of those which have passed the National Board of Censors has been declined except two comedies which were passed by on account of the fact that they did not contain informative features. Later the Parent-Teacher League will name a censor and probably an alternate to represent each of the Parent-Teacher Leagues in the city, and this board of thirty-two censors will approve every picture that is offered for the delectation and instruction of the juveniles. It will be divided up into four divisions of eight members each, and one group will censor each week's offering, so that the duty will not fall on each more than once in four weeks.

Besides the pictures the board will have sumbitted to it the musical program that is to be given while the pictures are being shown, so as to insure that this music will be appropriate and of the right kind. In addition the censors will also pass upon any additional attractions, such as vaudeville turns, that may be added to the program. For instance, at the first Mary Anderson performance "The Great Howard," who was on the bill at the Keith house, gave the children a demonstration of ventriloquism, explaining the principles of acoustics involved, and giving an informative talk that the children seemed to understand. Anyway, they received "The Great Howard's" offering with much approval. He donated his services.

The Board of Education has entered into the movement with great enthusiasm. Dr. I. N. Bloom, one of the leading members, expressed himself as sorry that it was not possible to announce the arrangements in the schools. This is impossible, however, in view of the fact that a rule prohibits announcements of an advertising character. The Parent-Teacher organizations, however, are active in spreading the tidings and there is not expected to be any difficulty encountered in establishing the Saturday morning shows just as regular matinee performances in the legitimate houses have been established in the public mind.

Not only have the organizations dealing directly with school problems given their approval of the movement, but other women's organizations, the local chapter of the Colonial Dames, for instance, have endorsed it. Mrs. John W. Bateman, president of the Parent-Teacher League, is outspoken in her approval and in assurances that the League will endorse the plan. Mrs. Bateman believes that sooner or later the motion picture will be of first importance in teaching children, and adoption of this film entertainment plan under approval of the Board of Education is a long step toward fulfillment of the hopes she has frequently expressed. That the beginning only has been made is shown by the statement of Dr. Bloom, already referred to, that in time the Louisville Public Schools themselves would provide good picture shows for the children. Generally, the movement is given hearty approval of Louisville people.

Aside from the advantage the plan will be to the Mary Anderson theater, this development of the motion picture business in Louisville is bound to help all the houses. It is suggested that besides possible extension of the idea to include numbers of other theaters in the city, so that the car fare of small children and their mothers or other attendants can be saved, the beginning may lead to establishment of a theater which will show pictures especially prepared for children. In other cities, where conditions are somewhat similar, the idea will apply as readily as in Louisville.

JAMES COOLEY JOINS IMP.

James Cooley, who is now playing in the Imp Company directed by Lucius Henderson, was born in Columbus, Ohio. He attended schools in Columbus and went later to the Ohio State University. In college he was a prominent member of the dramatic club and made a name for himself in many of the college plays. He graduated from the University and then took a trip to New York. In that city he was offered a small part in a stock company, and in a spirit of fun accepted it. That was the beginning of ten years on the legitimate. He soon worked himself up until he had made fame for himself. He played with Amelia Bingham and Dorothy Donnely during the last two years on the legitimate.

Joining the Reliance three years ago, he severed his connection with the legitimate. From the Reliance he went with the Biograph where he played leads. Following this he joined the Famous Players and took leading parts in several of their productions. Mr. Cooley is a thorough horseman.

"Zandori's Secret."

A Cure for Madness Has Been Found; But the Finder Has Gone Mad and the Villain Won't Use It to Help Him (Warner's Features).

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

IN one of its branches, the making of melodramas has become a race to invent villains of deeper and yet deeper dye. The tint and color of the best villain is not in his willingness to do evil—the devil himself is not more willing than the weakest of them—but in the ingenuity in contriving it or in the happy circumstance that gives him chance to fill out his bent in good round deeds. Of course, to brighten the love story is also to enhance the villain's work. But the race will never end; for the quality of evil is no more strained than that of mercy and it is just as deep. There is plenty of evil of all kinds left in hell to entertain us yet and the strangest thing is that to us, who walk upon the earth, that region is the most interesting place there is.

In this three-reel picture, "Zandori's Secret," made in France by the Eclair Company, the villain seems to have reached what is at present writing, the world's record for impudent ingratitude. He is one of two assistants of a doctor, Zandori, discoverer of a serum to cure madness. He has made trial of it on an unusually violent patient and restored to him his scattered senses; but in the struggle has been bitten and is doomed; for not realizing that he is infected he fails to take precaution to protect himself. Now, before the doctor goes mad, we find that both his assistants love the doctor's daughter. The hero loves her for herself; the villain for her father's money and position. She doesn't like the villain, so he contrives to make the doctor think the rival has betrayed the secret of the serum. Under the guise of friendship, the villain fools the rival so that he leaves without making any real attempt to clear himself and goes to Africa.

Now the doctor begins to show the effects of the bite of the mad patient (the author assumes that the spectator will allow this as natural enough, and without doubt many will gladly do so). The mad doctor has scratched his daughter in his delirium and she too is doomed. The villain has the serum. He is the doctor's nephew and if both his relatives go mad, will control the estate, so he doesn't administer the precious antidote. The lover is far away; but a note of the girl's maid warns him of his sweetheart's predicament and he comes post-haste to the rescue. But he can't take the case into court; no one would believe him and the villain sees to it that no one steals the serum and also sees to it that the two patients are kept well locked up, so even if his rival gets the medicine, he will be unable to use it. Yet a way is found and it makes the ending of the story sensational and snappy to a degree.

Renee Sylvaine plays the role of the girl with all her usual grace and ability as an actress. She is supported by a good cast that puts the story over in a natural and convincing way. The backgrounds and photography make the scenes beautiful in themselves. It is a very favorable offering.

MANAGER HYMAN INCREASES STAFF.

Arthur S. Hyman, manager of the Atlanta branch of the World Film Corporation, has found that the increase in his business has made necessary additions to his forces. Thomas F. McTyer has been secured as road man and a special feature department has been added by Manager Hyman. In this department he plans to handle Clara Kimball Young's release "Lola," "Seats of the Mighty," "Evidence," the Lyric Theater, New York, success and the Hippodrome photoplay "America." His office staff is composed of the following people: Arthur S. Hyman, manager; E. Combs, cashier and auditing department; J. B. Winbanks, manager booking department; J. C. Swift, manager shipping department; R. B. Wilbanks, chief inspector; Miss K. Chambers, in charge of information and inquiry department; Miss E. Gilman, chief corresponding stenographer; Miss M. Bridges, record department.

POWELL GOES TO FLORIDA.

Frank Powell, producer of features, who has recently come back to the William Fox fold, left on Monday for St. Augustine, Florida, with a company of stars. Mr. Powell is now engaged in the picturization of the original Klaw & Erlanger production of "A Fool There Was," the Porter Emerson Browne masterpiece in which starred Robert Hilliard and Pauline Fredericks, during its New York run at the Liberty Theater. Edward Jose often referred to as the Richard Mansfield of the pictures, has been engaged to play the Robert Hilliard role. Mr. Powell has chartered a private yacht to take his company to the land of sunshine.

Miss Mabel Taliaferro.

ALL the athletics which Mabel Taliaferro has indulged in as an amateur are proving very useful to her just now. Miss Taliaferro is to star in the Alco release "The Three of Us," work upon which has just been begun by B. A. Rolfe Photo Plays, Inc. Miss Taliaferro rides, fences, dances, swims, rows and plays baseball. Consequently she is a girl who is well fitted to hold her own amid the western surroundings of "The Three of Us."

Mabel Taliaferro.

The action of the piece gives her a number of long rides. In one scene there is a spirited race with a railroad train. Rhy MacChesney, which is the star role, is said by Miss Taliaferro's friends to have many attributes which are also those of the star. So Miss Taliaferro is happy in having found a congenial part and being able to indulge in her favorite athletic sports at the same time. The public gains thereby, as the effect upon the screen will be that much greater.

Miss Taliaferro's participation in "The Three of Us" is practically her debut in the world of photoplay. Hence it is a novel experience to her, but the many journeys which the production of "The Three of Us" makes necessary are no new thing to the young actress. She has been in more countries than the average player of her years. She played through Australia. In Ireland she played in the plays of William Butler Yates. She went through the earthquake in San Francisco and slept for eight days in Golden Gate Park. She went to South America on her yacht and made journeys in the interior.

The young screen star brings to the moving picture theater a wide experience despite her youth. This is made possible by the fact that her professional career began at the age of two. She was then seen in "Blue Jeans." As she grew older she became very popular as a child actress. After this period long engagements followed with Chauncey Olcott, K. D. Emmett and engagements in "Patent Applied For," "For Fair Virginia" and "The Price of Peace," and other notable productions.

"The Three of Us" in the legitimate is no stranger to Miss Taliaferro. She has been seen in special engagements in various cities of the country and among the plays in which she has been successful during that time is "The Three of Us."

HENDERSON, NEW IMP DIRECTOR, COMES FROM THANHOUSER.

Lucius Henderson, the new Imp director, has had a wide and varied theatrical experience. Coming, as he does from the ranks of the legitimate, where he spent many years treading the boards in as many characters, he combines a fine sense of the true drama with his experience as a director of motion pictures. When Mr. Thanhouser formed his first company eight years ago, he selected Mr. Henderson as his second director. Mr. Henderson worked under Mr. Thanhouser at the New Rochelle studios until the company was taken over by the present regime. At present Mr. Henderson is working on a story of exceptional heart interest, "The Broken Toy," in which Miss Violet Mersereau plays the lead.

LIFE PHOTO STUDIO AT LOS ANGELES.

The Life-Photo Film Corporation is to establish a new studio at San Diego, Cal. The great variety of the scenery of California appeals to the officials of the producing organization. It is quite possible, they say, to have forests, rivers, flatlands, prairies and deserts within easy reach of the central plant. Jesse Goldburg, secretary of Life-Photo, and Leonard Abrahams, vice-president, will leave in a few days for the west.

Pictures vs. Actors

Relating to the Utility, Mobility and Docility of the "Canned" Actor.

By Harry L. Reichenbach.

Webster says: Temperament—Temper in its abnormal phases. The theatrical manager says: Temperament—A scarecrow with a cauliflower ear and so unreliable that the buttercups growing in its yard are oleomargerine.

AFTER concluding one year in the realm of motion picturedom and recalling the many little episodes of my career in the legitimate and talking to the editor of The Moving Picture World, I happened to remark on the ease with which a motion picture production can be handled throughout the United States in comparison with the trouble experienced with the average temperamental theatrical organization. "That would make a good story," said the editor, so here I am. I hope it does. I am going to tell just what my feelings are after a year's work with "canned actors" in comparison with ten seasons in the legitimate.

Harry L. Reichenbach.

As manager of the "Are You a Mason?" company, playing at Ticonderoga, N. Y., one of the smallest towns in the world, including the Antarctic Circle, I was informed by the stage carpenter that my leading woman was ill. The property man's wife, who had been traveling with the company for some few weeks, and who was understudying several of the female roles, was hurriedly rehearsed and made her appearance that night and did fairly well. The following day, at Plattsburg, I called a rehearsal for two o'clock at the theater and the entire company was assembled there waiting for the new "leading woman." After about half an hour of waiting, I sauntered over to the hotel, knocked on the new "star's" door and reminded her that we had called a rehearsal for two o'clock and was told in a forcible manner by the new "leading woman" that she would be there at three o'clock, as she was just having her tea. I don't think she ever had a cup of tea in her life before; temperament was developing.

At Lynchburg, Va., the leading woman in the "We Are King" company refused to move from the depot to the theater at eight o'clock at night until we brought a 'bus to take her up the hill which ran from the station to the main street of the town. This particular actress was the recipient every Saturday night of twenty-five dollars (if business was good all week), and hardly had the courage to look a cab horse in the face, but her temperament took a strangle hold upon her histrionic ambition and it required quite a little hustling to secure a cab to transport her to the theater where we had our first good house of the season. She came very near wrecking the troupe. Two weeks later we allowed her to resign.

Temperament is a thing to be juggled with. If an actor wears a fur coat and struts up and down the principal cowpath of some one-lung, two-cylinder town in Iowa, he has more personal equation than Prexy Wilson, and the average rural ribbon distributor after one glimpse at his marcel, would willingly kiss the hem of his coat, but woe be unto his manager if ever one of them does kiss that hem. He becomes inflated and immediately demands a star's dressing room, with wall paper to match his patent leather eyebrows and dark brown disposition.

I remember the experience with one traveling company the name of which, through courtesy, I will omit. The heavy man boasted of his ability to hypnotize anyone who was willing to submit to his powers. The leading man and woman were man and wife and at Mansfield, Ohio, said heavy man succeeded in wielding his hypnotic influence on said leading woman, with the result that there were any number of black eyes in the troupe the following day and for two weeks following the hypnotic exhibition with its resulting athletic demonstration. I was compelled to spend two hours back stage each night to keep the belligerents apart and finally, at North Platte, Neb., miles from the nearest theatrical agency, the heavy man decamped, leaving behind a heritage of I. O. U.'s and a note saying that the leading woman much preferred him, and as the leading man was not man enough to withdraw, his temperament would not permit of his traveling in the same organization.

And so the little troupe passed away and yours truly became advance agent for an 1892 model boat show which was so bad that a reaction had set in and the show was actually getting good again. I can truthfully say that the only time throughout eleven years' experience with the best and worst shows in America, the only company I was connected with in which temperament did not play a disastrous role was with this self-same boat show which journeyed down the Mississippi River to New Orleans and then, after two performances at Bay St. Louis gave up the ghost by sinking to the bottom of the Gulf of Mexico, but doing so slowly enough to allow us to swim ashore.

Eva Tanguay cutting the curtain at a Pittsburgh theater because her trunks were left in the rain, Fritzi Scheff refusing to play an engagement at Worcester, Mass., because she couldn't have a front room in the corner on the third floor of the local hotel, Gertrude Hoffman walking off the stage because Lady Richardson's dressing room was ten feet nearer the stage than hers, Mme. Polaire, the homeliest woman in the world, refusing to play an engagement because an actress' alarm clock in an adjoining dressing room got on her nerves, are only slight reminders of what an important part temperament plays in the spoken drama.

Now for the "canned actor." Since beginning my engagement with the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, I have aided in the production and distribution of the following pieces: "The Squaw Man," "Brewster's Millions," "Master Mind," "The Only Son," "Man on the Box," "Call of the North," "The Virginian," "Bobby Burnit," "Where the Trail Divides," and so far I have yet to hear any one of the actors in any of the films register a complaint.

The entire cast of 'The Squaw Man" (in film form, of course,) lay in the freight office of the Erie depot for two days and nights during the coldest days last winter and were taken from there to the Circle Theater, where they gave a most excellent performance without showing the least strain of temperament after the severe ordeal.

The "Brewster's Millions" film, two hundred players in the cast, traveling from Los Angeles to New York, made five changes of trains en route, was carried from the Pennsylvania depot to Sherry's office in an express truck, wound and re-wound throughout the night and morning and opened at the Strand Theatre the same day at noon, and not a complaint.

There is no temperament among the "canned actors." You simply put the cast in a box, paste on the express label and the show is given as per schedule.

What a relief to have fifty-nine companies of "Brewster's Millions" playing and never receive a letter from the manager of one of the organizations saying that the leading woman is quitting in the middle of the second act because she got a "nasty letter from hubby" or that the leading man had a "bun" on and couldn't speak his lines.

There is a certain psychology about the actor which compels him to develop temperament at the most inopportune moment and there is a certain psychology about the motion picture that has attracted the theatrical man whose life has been shortened by temperament encountered (save the mark).

The average actor who develops temperament thinks he is simply standing on his rights. Rights are beautiful things if you can stand on them, but I witnessed a demonstration of the futility of standing on your rights a short time ago. A pedestrian crossing Broadway was warned against crossing until the officer had beckoned him over. He simply replied that automobiles haven't got the right of way all the time and started to cross Broadway. Moral: It is an unfortunate occurrence to be struck by a fast moving Packard, and doubly unfortunate if the Packard is a black car, for it denotes mourning.

When an actor develops temperament the show closes.
When a film develops temperament, patch it.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

WHEN, two weeks ago, two of the most prominent companies in the motion picture business, declared that, for self protection, exhibitors must raise their prices of admission the effect was very much like that produced by a thunderbolt coming from a clear sky. The declaration has since been the leading topic of discussion in all branches of the business. Since the days when bitter warfare was waged against certain manufacturers of motion pictures on a question of trade monopoly, no more important theme than the one presented by the declaration has been before the people who manufacture, rent, exhibit and patronize the picture houses.

The subject is one that must be handled with utmost delicacy and the least that can be said regarding the companies who have brought it to the front, is that the courage they displayed in doing so commands admiration. Every man in all branches of the business must admit that selling and rental prices in the motion picture business today are far below the figure allowing a fair profit to all concerned. Heretofore, however, none of the manufacturers, or rental exchange people, have been courageous enough to make the issue. Some manufacturers have hesitated because they feared the effect might impair their prestige with the exhibitors and competing companies might benefit. Other manufacturers, having in mind the same idea, have studiously watched for just such an opportunity to arise. There are a number of companies who have this plan of action in mind now. They want a market, or wish to extend the market they now have, by star spangled banner methods before the people, at the expense of those who may make an effort to raise the price of films, and consequently force exhibitors to raise the price of admission. This is one phase of the situation which is absorbing much profound thought.

Some manufacturers who have been approached regarding the situation are inclined to think that the campaign cannot be carried to a successful point under present conditions. The line of argument followed in its support has been misdirected in some respects. It has been too much like a mandate to the exhibitors to raise their prices and be prepared to meet an increase in prices to be made by the manufacturers and renters of films. A number of exhibitors have coincided in this view. They resent any attempt on the part of manufacturers, or film exchanges, to dictate in the management of their houses. This was emphatically demonstrated several years ago when the nucleus of the independent movement in the motion picture field in this country took shape. One very prominent exhibitor said he had no doubt about the truth of the statements made by companies that, to maintain the proper standard in photoplay productions, there must be an increase in price to meet the increased cost of production. He stated that knowledge he had gained through intimate friends engaged in the producing end of the business prepared him to accept the claims of the manufacturers as well founded. "But," said he, "why try to put me 'in Dutch' with my patrons? Why should the initiative in making the public pay more to see our shows be placed upon our shoulders? It is true that if any of us cannot afford to pay an increase in price to get what the people want, and should have, those who raise admission prices and get the goods will ultimately drive us out of business. But why make the exhibitor the 'Patsy?' Take up the newspapers and read of the hue and cry made against merchants who raise the price of their goods before prices have been advanced by the manufacturers. The motion picture business differs from all other lines so far as general operations are concerned, but in this instance the conditions are identical. The support of the public has been drawn to motion pictures by educational methods and the same kind of a campaign must be followed to secure the public's assent to anything bearing upon that support. If the producers and exchanges must raise prices let them do so. The exhibitors will then be in a position to go before the people and tell them that the increased first cost makes it imperative that we raise our admission prices. If the public fails to respond we must then go out of business. To my mind, the producers should give all publicity they can to their claim that, unless they get better prices, they must fall back to inferior products, or retire from the field. Then let them give the exhibitors due notice of increase, so that they may arrange to meet the raise."

Another exhibitor said "The houses that will find it most difficult to raise admission prices are those charging five cents admission. I fear that many of them will be unable to get an increase now, especially in districts where the poorer class of people predominate. When the business revival, which we all look for, sets in there will be a chance to make the raise. Meantime the people of the sections I refer to must be catered to. It will not do to sacrifice quality and risk losing the patronage it has taken so much time and hard work to win. Do not misunderstand my reference to the poorer classes. I do not speak of the cheap dumps that appeal to the undesirable class of people. They do not figure in the situation at all. They will only take junk service and their action is immaterial to the legitimate branch of the motion picture business. The people who must be taken care of are the educated and respectable poor who know and are willing to pay for good pictures when industrial conditions will permit them to do so."

"Let me drive one thing home," continued the exhibitor, "ruinous competition has had as much to do with bringing about the present condition of affairs among the manufacturers and rental exchanges as anything else. I will add without fear of serious contradiction that it has had more bearing than anything else on the situation. There are too many producers and rental exchanges in the field. It is a case of shrinking revenue brought about by almost criminal methods rather than increased cost. These cut-throat tactics have not been felt by producers and rental exchanges alone. The exhibitors have also suffered. Think of a house in this city of ours, with a seating capacity of six hundred, charging five cents admission for a programme of nine reels. The exchange that supplies that house is as culpable as the manager of it. I get nothing less than ten cents at any of my houses, yet I cannot afford to put on a nine-reel program. I know I pay more for my service than the nine-reel fellow does and that I would not run his service; but that does not justify any exchange that looks to the welfare of the motion picture business, in encouraging the junk dealers."

"I have heard many exhibitors complain that rental exchanges, in which photoplay manufacturers have an interest, is a species of monopoly that steadily grinds the profits out of the exhibitors. I will admit that there has been cause for complaint along these lines, but rental exchanges backed by responsible and legitimate producers are preferable to the junk shops that make a pretense of giving something for nothing. To get good photo plays there must necessarily be considerable outlay on the part of the producers and the film exchanges should receive rental prices that will enable them to handle such productions. In the natural course of events, the exhibitor must get box office prices that will enable him, in turn, to handle the films. But if the manufacturers and exchanges want the exhibitors to take the films and help keep before the public the class of goods that help sustain the business as a whole, they should protect those exhibitors and discourage any assistance to the cheap John line of exchanges and exhibiting houses. I regret to say that one of the most prominent of the recent acquirements to the ranks of producers has been guilty of peddling its films to a class of exhibitors that are a menace to the business and would not use the films if they were not peddled at ridiculously low prices. We all have the chance to get the same service. That is not the question. This company I speak of, arms my competitor with material (I confess some of it very good) at prices which makes it impossible for me to put on some pictures my audiences want, because I cannot afford to pay the prices at which they are held. For instance, say I book a big feature at increased expense. My competitor, with the assistance of the company that rents for practically anything it can get, puts on a rattling good program on the same night at half, or less, that my show costs me. Now, how can I meet such competition and at the same time raise my prices of admission? The situation is clear. House cleaning must begin at the headquarters of distribution. If I must raise prices in order to stay in the business then the manufacturers and rental exchanges must see that uniform rentals be sustained to protect the exhibitors who pay the prices. This is one of the solutions to the problem. If the exhibitors are to help keep manufacturers and rental exchanges in business the latter must safeguard the exhibitors against unfair and reckless competition. If they do this the five-cent theater will soon be a thing of the past and the junk dealers will be relegated to the sphere in which they belong. They are the people who have helped flood and cripple the market. When they are wiped out the manufacturers, exchanges and exhibitors will reap what is due them.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Population 500.

POSSESSING a population of but 500, there is a town in North Carolina that plays the Paramount program regularly at 15 cents and 25 cents. More, it played Quo Vadis and the Kleine Pompeii and other big attractions. This fact has already been stated in this department, but we asked the manager, Charles W. Picquet, to tell us how he did it with the Princess, and he was good enough to give us the details. We think that most small town managers, who fight for five cents, will read this with interest. It might also appeal to George R. Carpenter, Barrett S. McCormick and others who are fighting for at least ten cents for features in Denver. Mr. Picquet writes:

No, we have no big cities in this radius. Our nearest big town is Raleigh, 68 miles away, and we can hardly call that a city as its picture houses are way behind southern pines for good service.

It might not be amiss to say I am an old "show man," having been in the business (opera) as manager, leading tenor, stage manager and various other capacities. My assistant, who handles the projection end of it, is an experienced electrician, having been in charge of the electrical department of a large wholesale house in Cleveland. Last December neither one of us knew anything about the moving picture business, but the first thing we did was to subscribe for the Moving Picture World, and when we got it we studied it. Our motto from the beginning has been quality rather than quantity. We had no capital, so we could not buy a gold fibre screen, but we did the next best thing and studied one out ourselves, and if I do say it, we have a better and steadier picture than they run in Raleigh or Charlotte or even Washington.

We have our own power plant, consisting of a 9-horsepower Fairbanks engine and a large dynamo which makes a perfect light, and a 6A Powers' machine. The theater is built of cement blocks, seats 300 and cost $5,500. We have a perfectly appointed stage and my wife (who was my prima donna in opera) and myself put on one or two sketches a week on the nights we run the Paramount program.

We started with the Universal service at ten cents and charged 15 cents for the three-reel features.

I soon found that the latter wouldn't work as the average regular program three-reel picture isn't worth over 10 cents.

I then began to cast about for pictures worth while and found that I could not get out on them at 15 cents so I had to educate them to pay 25 cents. There was a considerable kicking for awhile, but I was absolutely honest with them and gave them an itemized account of the cost of the big pictures (which the local paper published) and then framed the contracts and hung them in the lobby for their inspection.

We didn't make a cent on the special pictures and sometimes lost, and to convince the public that I was giving them a square deal I got a local merchant to go into the box office on two occasions, sell the tickets, check up, audit the bills and left it to him to tell the others—and he did. I also watched the dailies from all the big cities and whenever I found a picture running in any of the theaters, after we had run it, I let the people know it.

I appealed to their pride by telling them that this little town was the only one of its size between Washington and Atlanta that had the privilege of seeing these productions, and while we could not go to New York we were seeing the Broadway stars and the great theatrical successes right here in the Princess for 25 cents. I have also impressed upon them the fact that the Strand in New York was running these same pictures at prices ranging from 25 cents to $1. We also use a good-sized space in the local paper and in return the editor runs a lengthy criticism on every picture and locals all through. I advertise these pictures just as I would any Broadway production, never mentioning the number of reels of feet. We are very careful in selecting the pictures and the parents know they can send their children to us at any time without fear of their seeing anything that will offend or shock.

We run no "grocery slides" between pictures, but I typewrite between eight and ten slides, describing the next production, and try to word the ads in such a way that they will attract attention. Occasionally I get a laugh out of one of them and that awakens the interest.

During the months of July and August it is so hot here that everybody who can scrape up the railroad fare goes North until this town is almost deserted, but by running electric fans, supplying everybody with hand fans and serving ice water in sanitary drinking cups, we managed to keep open and stay a little ahead of the game.

I had the united opposition of the ministers when we first started, but I got "Pilgrim's Progress," "Ivanhoe" and one or two others of like character, personally invited them to attend, got the school principal to come and gave the school children a free performance and now they are all with me. We have always been absolutely honest with the public. If a picture wasn't much, we told them so.

To make a long story short we have worked just as hard on this little proposition as we would if we were managing the Strand and, by the way, the methods adopted by the Strand manager have been an inspiration and a guide to me. The public is pretty much the same all over the world and if one appeals to their intelligence and their sense, they will appreciate it and become a standby.

I am enclosing a postcard of the theater and under another cover am mailing you our program of the opening night.

Am thinking very seriously of running three good productions a week and cutting out the regular service.

Our patrons have been educated up to the point where they do not care for the cheaper pictures, and as long as the Paramount pictures are kept up to their present standard we will have no trouble in holding our patronage at 25 cents.

I would like to emphasize the importance of a first-class operator. Without the aid and loyal suport of my assistant, Mr. Rush, who has ever been on the qui vive to improve the projection, who has made his end of the business a deep study, whose aim is always to run a picture well and artistically rather than to "get it through" as quickly as possible; in other words, a man who has brains and uses them, my work would go for naught, for without good projection a manager has a handicap that no amount of advertising can overcome.

I would like to add also that Mrs. Picquet is at the ticket window with a smile and a good word for every one and I am always on the door with the glad hand of welcome when they come in and a "good-night—come again" when they go out.

Have I covered the ground? It looks to me as if I had plastered it, but you have only yourself to blame.

You asked me for more detail and you sure have it.

The house, as can be seen from the cut, is not an elaborate one, but it's larger than the town, and in an earlier letter Mr. Picquet wrote that he tried to reach the people within a radius of eighteen or twenty miles. He encloses some of his postcards to show one way he goes after the business, but an old showman does not pin his faith to one idea alone and we have asked for more detail on this point.

For lantern slides he uses a parchment tissue with a double line ruled, one inside the other. The line is printed. They can be run off by the local printer in a spare hour. A thin but tough paper should be used and the lines should be close to the edge and again about where the opening in the usual mat is. Mr. Picquet writes directly on the surface with his usual purple ribbon. We think he would get a vastly better impression by using the soft or "railroad" carbon paper, using each sheet but once or at most two or three times. This paper should be cut to exact size. A paper facing should be used or the carbon will cut throug hand some letters clog up.

Mr. Picquet, with good showmanship, is making the Princess pay in a small town. What he can do others can do with the same care.

Back Again.

Look who's here! The Academy of Music, Selma, Ala., and after all the talk some time ago against features, they are going to run two a week. The announcement is made in an opening-of-the-season booklet that is well done from every point of view. The cover is a dark green with the inside pages in cream, printed in deep green on a faint tint, except the page announcing the features, where the tint block gives a heavier impression. It is in every way one of the handsomest publications we have seen. It recites with modest pride the manifold advantages of the house, the theater having been remodeled during the summer. Now if they will resume the Academian our joy will be complete. We do not think that they can afford to send samples of this booklet. It is too costly for general distribution. One unusual point is that there are no cuts, but none seem to be needed with the word-pictures.

What Do You Say.

Before our comment on a recent announcement in the Rextra of Hopkinsville, Tenn., got into print the manager and a friend got into an argument over the meaning of the paragraph that reads:

> Wednesday of this week will give some few people in Hopkinsville a chance to get out their little hammer and start to work. On that day the admission to the Rex will be 10 and 20 cents. This is the one day for the balance of the year that you cannot get into our theater for less than ten and twenty cents.

In the issue of October tenth we commented on this rash promise, but the manager claims that the line means that for the remainder of the year Wednesday will be the only advance-admission day. His friend claims that since Wednesday of the week in question is specifically mentioned, it means that this is the one single day when the admission will run that high. This latter seems to be the only proper construction since one day is mentioned and one day of the week—which should have been used to convey the proper idea. You cannot be too explicit in your statements.

Wuxtra!

Korford and Ryan, as has been stated, get out a daily paper, or rather father a daily gotten out by one of the weekly sheets, at Brigham City, Utah. Now they get another step up the ladder in a sixteen page special edition for "Peach Day," containing the official program for the celebration. The best they got out of the special was one-eighth page advertisement. That was hardly enough. If they had offered tickets to the Alta to the prize winners, or had tendered a box party, they could have gotten right in on the program and could have drawn the crowd with the winners. As it was they were rather crowded out of their supposedly own sheet. No matter what the local celebration may be, be on edge to get in somehow and somewhere. Offer the special Picto cash prize or something, but get in where you will be seen.

What Is It.

The Haynic advertises:

> Lubricate your Laughograph and come down and hear it work.

Details and scale drawings on that Laughograph, please.

Picking On Pickings.

We do not like to pick on Paramount Pickings, Minneapolis, but will the editor please tell us if the last contribution on page three of number six is poetry or just set that way? It is announced as a tale in rhyme, but we protest that end-sent, and myself-shelf are not rhymes within the rulings of the Poets' Union.

Some of the Ads.

The first impression of the advertising is that the ad writer has learned the first great lesson of not trying to tell too much at once. Several of the exhibits are small cards with merely a line or two.

One, for example, advertises "The Blue Mouse." This is a blue card with the mouse in a twelve point oval, the title above in thirty point and the name of the house and the dates below in smaller type. The cut of the mouse and the type title are the attention getters. The rest will be read if the interest is gained. Another wording is merely

See what
The Tango Craze
Does at the Third Street Theater
Saturday,
May 2.

In this the top line is in six point, the second in thirty, the third in eight, the next in twelve, the day in eighteen and the date in twelve again. The space is between the first and second lines and the second and third, with about eight points between the third and fourth. As a result the line stands out, gets the eye and leads to the rest. There are several other cards, all along the same lines, none of them burdened with text and yet the stronger for the lack of it.

On the other hand, some of their newspaper advertising runs six point unleaded short synopses—almost a waste of money. There is enough larger type to get the message over, but much six point in a double column advertisement is type and space wasted. It looks better opened with two point leads, but it would look even better in eight point leaded. A larger space in the Sunday issue in ten and twelve point gets over, but ten point is about the smallest type that should be used in a display advertisement—and except as a solid reader with a humorous twist, newspaper space should be displayed. One of the exceptions is the stuff run by the Star, Chambersburg, Pa.—at least we think it is Chambersburg.

In all cases, however, they get the titles in big type and the name of the house in still larger.

Come On.

The entries are going to be kept open in the Quo Vadis? contest. Comes Z. O. Brooks, of the Star, Goldendale, Wash. Get him:

> I just received our copy of the World, and see where you ask for some one else to "whittle down Kuhn's figures," so will try and do my share. I noticed where the gentleman from North Carolina started something, and thought at that time that there were many Western places that could give him a little information. We just ran "Antony and Cleopatra" and intend to put on "The Last Days of Pompeii" soon. Our town is only 1,201 population, and we have another house to compete with.
> When we bought our house, the first instructions we got, were to send for the World, and the Handbook.

If That's the Case.

James C. Rathbone, of the Opera House, Exeter, N. H., used to be one of the standbys of this department, but he writes that he gets so much ready-made stuff that he does not have to do as much original work as formerly. If that's the case we'll get the subscription department to kill off his paper for a few weeks now and then. But we won't do it just this moment for he sends in some stuff. One is an excuse to get people in to see the first installment of "The Million Dollar Mystery." Just to make them work their way in, he gives them a card to fill out. It's much the same sort of card you may have used, being checked to suit the preference of the patrons, but the introduction is new. It reads:

WE WANT TO KNOW

> Just what kind of pictures you like best, as we can't afford to take many chances in getting high-priced subjects if you don't care for them and are not willing to pay a small advance in price to see them.
> When you go into a store to make a purchase, you buy what you want, and if you don't like what you see, you don't take it.
> The Moving Picture Theater is different. You pay before entering, and if you don't like it you must take it anyway.
> It's going to be different with the EXETER OPERA HOUSE.
> Answer "yes" or "no" to the following. Return to the Box Office Friday Night if you wish to avail yourself of the offer on the other side, otherwise bring any time next week and your vote will greatly assist us in making out bookings for the coming season.

A folder gives a list of coming releases and the winter schedule of the Boston and Maine. The latter will be kept, and so long as it is kept the bookings will be kept, as well, since they are on the reverse side. This local stuff, the arrival and departure of trains, the trolley schedule, the fire box calls or anything like that, is good for the small town because it not only gets into the house, but stays there. Mr. Rathbone overlooked one point, though, in not having the name of the house on the page with the schedule. It may be pasted or tacked to the wall, in which case there is nothing to show where it came from. Here is another point: Suppose your opposition gives the time table. Note the express and local trains and you'll have something better than the other chap. There is the unconscious suggestion that your show is better because your time table is.

To Wesley.

It comes as a shock to learn of the death of Mr. Wesley. He died last Spring and it was not until we started in to coax a rise out of him that we learned of the fact, then both Mr. Buzzell and Mr. Pitman wrote in. It was he who gave to the business the "say so" that is now widely used, and on that alone he could go down in history, but he originated many other quaint conceits and in his passing went a man whom we had come to regard as a friend. It was a grisly jest that our last comment should have been to the effect that he seemed to be dead. We expected to be called various picturesque sorts of prevaricator in his usual breezy fashion, but he was, in truth, dead. Those who have profited by his many suggestions will share in a measure our regret, though they lacked the personal touch of his letters.

So-U-Ma-No

Ralph Ruffner, of the American, Butte, Montana, sends in this:

> "SO-U-MA-NO" When Famous Players Play, as well as WHERE Famous Players Play, I am enclosing herewith two samples of a ready reference card for our patrons, cut to a size that will easily fit vest pocket or purse.
> Containing, as it does, the entire program for the balance of the month of October, it is an easy matter to see just what THE AMERICAN has to offer. Things that are given to people at the door generally find their way to the janitor's room. To stop this waste we endeavored to attach real value to these little calendars in the minds of our patrons by running a slide, thus: "We have prepared a neat little calendar of all our programs for the balance of the month of October. These will be given gratis to anyone. Kindly ask usher on your aisle. NOW READY." At closing time not a one was found on the floor, which is very gratifying and a good record, considering more than two thousand were handed out during the evening.
> We intend issuing these every month, with our programs outlined thirty days in advance. The character of service we are using makes this possible, with, of course, the exception of fillers, and this detail is provided for in the little explanation at the bottom of the card.
> Again Santa Claus is on the job with the offer to send a sample to any exhibitor (Chris. Engelman, write) who cares to write for one, as long as they last. Don't forget that little retail about the stamped-self-addressed-envelope.

The card is stiff green stock, 4¼ by 5¼, folded once. It opens to the wide way and across the page is the day and date, title, star, number of parts and name of the brand of every special for the month. If you are willing to spend a little money for your advertising, get one of these and copy it. It is worth while stuff. Most of Mr. Ruffner's is, for that matter.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

EVERYONE knows that two, added to two, makes four, and that three and two are five. If you started to demonstrate the two times two proposition and by mistake mixed a two and a three to get four and found you had five, it is probable that you would take away the three and put a two in its place.

When your story adds up five and you want to get a result of four, take out the factor that makes the five and replace it with something that will give you what you want. Plot writing is not a rigid process. It is elastic in the extreme. If you start a story and find it is too bloodthirsty, you can remove a couple of the murders and get something less violent. If you have a plot that is not strong enough you can add more punch and get something better, just as you can add two and two and get four or add two and three and get the higher number.

The story you write does not have to be the story you thought of. The theme you started with is no more than the starter. You can, if you wish, start with an intensely tragic theme and by the process of addition and elimination wind up with a comedy. It is not until you realize this fact and practice the trick that you head in toward success.

Suppose, for instance, that you conceive the idea of an old man, a widower, whose affections are completely centered in his daughter. He removes her to the wilds, fearful that if he lives among men she will marry and leave him. A young hunter penetrates the solitude and the girl falls in love. The jealous old man kills the girl and himself, and the hunter, coming upon their bodies, completes the tragedy by killing himself.

There is nothing very cheerful in that. Suppose we lighten it. The young people run away to get married and the old man kills himself while they are gone. They return to find the corpse. It is still too heavy. Let's change it so that the old man, realizing the shortness of his declining days, makes a sacrifice of affection and lets them get married. We see them start for their honeymoon and we see the poor, lonesome old man sitting beside the cabin door in the twilight, and as he smiles the death angel claims him and gives him the release he wished for. If that is still too heavy, simply close in on the old man sitting there, finding happiness in the thought of the happines of the lovers.

That might make a good heart drama. But suppose that the retirement to the wilderness had a more specific cause. Suppose that Nell has been taken from the city because her father does not wish her to marry Jack. Suppose that the reason is that the father had a dispute with Jack's mother, a widow, over a line fence or the woman's suffrage question. Jack follows Nell, and his mother, a woman of spirit, thinks it is a ruse and follows Jack to prevent the marriage. Suppose that the young people elope and the old lady comes on Nell's father and charges him with having encouraged the match all the time. Suppose that the old man gets so excited that he has a stroke. The old lady nurses him back to health. Gratitude replaces spite and they, too, get married. Now the story has moved from tragedy to comedy. A slight "roughing up" will make it farce comedy and so it can be run until it becomes sheer slapstick.

Any story can be twisted in any direction the author wishes if the author has had the proper experience. It is a good plan, now and then, to sit down with no thought of making an immediate sale and translate comedy into tragedy and vice versa. Learn to master plots instead of letting them master you. Juggle factors as you juggle figures and you can make your story add up almost any sum, just as with two figures you can get any combination from 10 to 99 and the addition of a third will run you anywhere from 100 to 999.

Don't let your plots get the best of you. Get the best of your plots and you can get the best of plots.

Blending.

Perhaps you've watched an artist in charcoal work on a sketch. The lines are laid in with the charcoal stick—harsh, crude lines that suggest no beauty, but rather the effort of some child. Then the artist starts in with a stomp to finish up. He blends the lines, working some out into soft black masses, others into still softer greys, until the whole is smooth and harmonious. You would not give ten cents for the crude sketch. The finished product may be worth important money.

It is the same way with a photoplay. You sketch in your main points. All of the real story is there, but the work is rough and without symmetry. As it stands it is worth little. Blend plot with incident and presently there is produced a script that moves so easily and harmoniously from one point to the next that there is no mental shock, no rude awakening of the imagination. It is a perfect blend. Almost any one can make a rough sketch. It is the blending that counts most.

Maybe.

"Maybe, as you say, the gems I write are too unusual. What must I do? Wait for the editors to grow—or educate them?"

That's the come-back on a recent suggestion. The answer is obvious. It will not pay to try and educate the editors. It will not be profitable to wait. Write what the foolishly uneducated editors seem to want and wait for the day when they get fired and more intelligent ones are hired. It may be a long wait, because the "unusual" story too often means that the author rides his own particular hobby until he wears the rockers off.

Don't conduct an educational campaign. It seldom pays. Either write what is wanted or do not kick at your failure to sell.

Your Worst.

Five letters, all in the last two weeks, say practically the same thing, that growing progress seems to be marked by the fact that some stories are now held for examination, but that these are "the poorest of the lot."

The answer to that is easy. The poorest of the lot—to you—is that which interests you the least, and yet it might be the style of stuff most apt to interest the editors, since these stories are held and your pets are not. Why not study these "poorest" and see what there is that appealed to the directors and then build up on that line of work. Of course if you write to please yourself, and only yourself, you must not expect to interest the editors, but if you want to sell see what there was to the story that was favorably received that your pet stories lack.

Nine times out of ten you'll probably find that the "poor" stories are simple, direct and forcefui, lacking the over-elaboration and involved psychology of the favored few. It got over where a jumble of mixed motives and involved ramification never even was understood.

More Jones Visions.

Marc Edmunds Jones arranged to write some Mutual Girl stories and then hustled in here to establish an alibi. They asked for visions and he swears by his typewriter that the visions were written in by request and not in accordance with his supposed habit of visioning everything he writes. When the visions start in the M. G. then you may know it is where Jones' work began.

Those Dog Stories.

Thus far perhaps a hundred stories have been sent in reply to the offer to give the address of a company in the market for dog stories to those persons whose synopses came up to the mark. This restriction was made to save the company from a flood of scripts of doubtful value. The address has been sent to but two or three persons.

It was clearly stated that there was a dog—one dog—and that the company wanted stories for a dog. One story called for sixteen dogs of various breeds. Several called for two to four dogs. Many of the stories made the dogs merely incidental. A large number took the most obvious idea, the dog that did not recognize the master. A dozen wrote of the brave dog that saves the children, but forgot to put a plot in. Perhaps half merely used the dog incidentally, though it was announced that the stories were to be written around the dog. One script played about half the scenes in the depths of the forest at dead of night, several called for automobile runs, one demanded a whole fire department to back up the dog and only three gave a real story to the dog.

If the writers cannot read the message more clearly than this, it is not surprising that so small a percentage of stories are purchased. Any hack writer can take a story and force a dog into it. The writing of a story for and about a dog that a dog can play is another test.

No Goat.

One chap who bought a technique thought he could get a goat from us free, so he asked us to read a recent article on "be explicit" and then read in the book that a character says that another character will sign a paper. That, he contends, is not an explicit action. It is. It tells the director in the fewest words what the situation is and tells him in such a manner that it will get over. The phrase is, "Bascom says John will sign." Surely that is explicit enough since the moment later John does sign and is seen to sign. The "Bascom says" merely indicates that Bascom acts pleased instead of disappointed or angry. It merely indicates his frame of mind. The explicit action comes immediately after when John is seen to sign. If Bascom has told John to come to his own home the next day at half-past twelve and then sign, that action, written without a leader, would not have been explicit.

Studying.

Lately we ran a scene as it was written by a novice and then gave the correct writing. A correspondent wants more of this, writing that she read down to the incorrect example, tried to correct it herself and then read the answer. This is a good scheme and when we can get the material we shall be glad to run more examples, but it is not easy to get real problems, and only real ones will help.

Here is one that will perhaps throw some light. A scene shows three persons. One of these wishes to tell another of an incident that happened early in the play. He does not want to vision the five scenes that covered the incident, and yet he wants to get the idea over clearly. How should he do it?

The suggestion offered was to run a leader, "John tells Henry the story." Now, we see John talk to Henry. The scene fades down, the most important of the five early scenes is flashed, and the scene comes back to the telling of the tale. The leader is explanatory. The flash serves the double purpose of clinching the leader and breaking the long narrative.

Fool Questions.

We like to help others, but we certainly do get conversational when we are asked how many words there are in a two-column newspaper head. Every city, town, hamlet and farm gets hold of some newspapers from time to time. Every newspaper has two-column heads.

Please do not ask what you ought to be able to find out for yourself. Ask what you can't find out and you'll be most cheerfully and courteously answered.

Wrong Scripts.

A foolish author sassed us back the other day because we refused him the address of the Coroner of Inquest in another city. Naturally we thought he was an advice grafter. Back he came with a foolish note to the effect that he had received by error a script written by a man in the Coroner's town instead of his own. We sent the Coroner's address, though we did not see what the Coroner had to do with it, and he came back with the remark that he had sent the maverick back to the company he received it from—which was what an intelligent person would have done in the first place.

If you receive the script of another person by mistake, send it back to the company and ask for your own. Don't do a "Burns" and try and locate the author. Send it back to the company.

And by the way, mark your envelope itself so that you may know what company it comes from. Put your mark inside envelope. Then if you get an enevelope and a script not your own, you'll know what company made the mistake and you can look to them for your own instead.

But don't ask for Coroners' addresses. You won't get them.

Listen to Kell.

John William Kellette speaks these words of wisdom:

"The man who would climb the ladder of fame mustn't linger too long on each round of applause."—Life.

In other words. After you write a script and send it out, don't sit down and wait for the mail man to bring back the check. It might not come. He might bring the script instead, and there you've been dreaming about nothing at all. After you've written a script, and you're satisfied you can't do anything to improve it, send it out and then sit down to write another script. Figure it sold if you want to, but also figure when you're writing the second script that your second effort will be better than the first and will pass the check on its way back. I wrote a story that ran, apparently, parallel with one written by Epes Wintorop Sargent. He beat me to it by several months. I threw it in the morgue. It was numbered No. 6, and written may 28, 1913. My last number was 130. One day, recently, I went to the sepulcher and removed the script. Sent it out unchanged. It was taken and made a corking comedy, but the name was changed to "Sid Nee's Finish." Had I sent it on tour when Sargent's story was released I'd been accused of stealing. Yet Mr. Sargent, who saw the script, said it was nothing like the one he wrote. You would have had a hard time convincing editors of that, though. This is to simply encourage you over the stuff you've got in your morgue. Go to it. Exhume your dead scripts. If you notice a sign of life resuscitate them. If not—bury 'em deeper. Your duty, though, is to rescue when you believe they have a chance to live. And then, again, it will show you whether you've improved or not since the time of interment. If you haven't, clean out the morgue and get in there yourself. Study your stuff on the screen to see what the director and the joining room did to it. Its been viewed from four different angles since it left your hands—the editor's, the director's, the negative cutter's, the censors! If you still recognize your story there's hope for you because you made it clear enough to be followed. Be optimistic. Editors haven't time to steal plots. They'd have time to write two new ones while trying to find your old one. Out of 130 scripts I've never had one pilfered and never expect to have one. But I try to write stories so novel in plot and new in action that if anybody thought of "copping" one his conscience would twit him about it and he'd be afraid that I wouldn't send him another. So, if you believe anybody's been stealing your stuff stop kidding yourself. They've simply beat you to it.

The Fatal First.

Some one just raised Gehenna with us for telling him that we were sorry he had sold his first script and warning him to keep his head down to the old hat brim. And about three mails later comes this:

> Last March I got the writing bug after reading in advertisements how easy it was, bought a so-called text book and started off amid the loud ha-ha's of my friends. I sent my first effort to a certain company. It naturally came right back. I studied the pictures, counted the number of scenes, saw how the laughs were brought out and managed to get hold of a couple of scripts that had been produced. Then I wrote out a real scenario, sent it to the same company and they promptly paid me $30 for it. It looked like easy money to me and my head started to swell and I have since written on and off a total of 14 scenarios and have sold three of them to the same company. I find it to be hard work to write scenarios. I have to scribble the whole thing out in long hand and then pound it out on the machine with two fingers. A couple of months ago I started reading your articles in the Moving Picture World and they are certainly great. No bull about that. They gave me a new viewpoint of the scenario game.
> Now for the trouble. About two weeks ago one of my scenarios was produced. The director says it is one of the best he has ever turned out and has asked me to write another featuring the same lead, an eccentric old maid. She has also begged me to write another one, but I can't do it to save my life. Every spare minute I have is devoted to deep thought, but nothing comes of it. I have tried and tried, but cannot seem to develop a plot that will hold water. Can conceive plenty of funny situations, but can't get them in shape. I seem to have petered out and gone stale. What is the matter with me? I have had no literary training, but think that for a boob and a big one I have done pretty well. Have only been able to sell to the one company. Am welcomed at their studio any time and go there every chance I get. I seem to have lost self-confidence and the more I try the more I am dissatisfied with my work.

Now, that's what you call tough luck. Here is a man who has sold a script so good that they want others like it, and he cannot write others like it because he is still a beginner. If he could write more like the first he would be solid with that company perhaps for years, but he only lately started to read this department and did not know the danger of starting to sell too soon. By accident he wrote an unusually good script; one so good that they ask for more like it, and he cannot write them because he does not know how. He has written but fourteen stories, and he cannot yet write to order because he has not had the practice, and so he sees the pretty bubble burst. He got his sale and his chance too soon. We have advised him to give his mind a rest on that story for a couple of weeks, for he has thought on it to the point where he can think no more, and we've pointed out that it is practice that will make him perfect.

The man who makes a solid success can write anything—in reason—to order. George Hennessy wrote a story around an ash can. Marc Edmund Jones has written on every known source of illumination, we've written around a potato patch, a clinical thermometer, a wireless mast, lip reading, tuberculosis, safety first, Jerry Hevener's automobile and other things too numerous to mention. Bill Wright can do you stuff advertising tooth paste, the new thought movement, three-dollar shoes, five-dollar pants or eight-cylinder automobiles, because he specializes in advertising film and can deliver the goods, but the fourteen-script man has not yet advanced to the point where he can hug a chance to his chest when the chance comes over to his house and breaks down the door when he won't answer the bell.

You MUST do your preparatory work. Go ahead and do it.

Know Your Facts.

If you know nothing about aeroplanes, do not try to write a script where the aeroplane punctures its tire. You'll be laughed at. Few people would make so glaring an error, but almost every one will make a similar mistake. The other day a new chum wanted to force a girl—a young and innocent girl—to go to work so she would make a hit in grand opera. So he had the girl's father, a locomotive engineer, get his hands burned so he would have to lay off and she would have to study for grand opera, and she did and made a startling success before daddy's hands got well and he could go back to the engine cab.

Now, to begin with, it takes from six to sixty years to get on the grand opera stage, and papa's hands should have been healed well inside of six years. In the second place it takes oodles of money to study for opera, and father could not begin to pay the bills on his salary from the railroad even if he was working, and certainly not when he was not, and most important of all, if an engineer gets laid off for injury, either the road or the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers would have looked after him. The author did not know about railroad business. He did not know about studying for opera. He fooled with something he did not know about—and almost made an ass of himself.

Write from your personal knowledge and not from guess work. If you have your hero operated on for appendicitis, do not have him perform a heroic rescue following a leader—"One week later." Ask a physician how long it would be before that sort of thing could happen. Then you'll be right.

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT is an established rule of the department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until the excellence of such articles have been demonstrated to its editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two to three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending four cents, stamps (less than actual cost) will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail without delay. Special replies by mail on matters which cannot be replied to in the department one dollar.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready, and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you cannot answer without a lot of study. Canadians should send P. O. M. O. or coin only.

Question No. 60.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Theater managers looking for high-class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Explain, in complete detail, what a fuse is for, and exactly how it operates. What, roughly, is the composition of a fuse? Tell us what size fuse it would require to convey power for a 50 h. p., 110-volt motor and for a 50 h. p. 500-volt motor. What would be the difference in fuse requirements for a 40-ampere projection arc as between the primary and secondary sides of an economizer; as between the line and lamp side of a rheostat?

Roll of Honor.

The Roll of Honor on Question No. 54 consists of Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; A. C. Stewart, Waitsburg, Washington; J. I. Roberts, Nashville, Tennessee; Montreal, Canada, and John Solar, Watertown, New York.

Quite a number of very good answers do not get on the Roll of Honor because of the fact that they come too late. Those who have the question booklet could, and should, have three or four answers here in advance, and this would give time for their proper consideration. It would be better all the way around. After the Roll of Honor is made up I cannot keep adding names, because very shortly thereafter the matter goes to the printer, and there are three weeks' questions in the printer's hand all the time. Moral: Get busy!

NOTICE: ALL THOSE WHO WANT THE SECOND AND LAST SECTION OF THE QUESTIONS PUBLISHED IN BOOK FORM WILL PLEASE REMIT TWENTY-FIVE CENTS, MONEY, MONEY ORDER OR STAMPS, IMMEDIATELY. If there is sufficient response to meet the expense of publishing the questions in booklet form, the same as the first section, all right, I will go ahead and do it, otherwise the money will be returned. I am willing to do it, but I am not willing to stand a financial loss. Now, if you wish it done it is up to you. The publication will cost approximately $50.00.

Answer to Question No. 54.

By John Solar, Watertown, N. Y.

The Question:

Suppose the incandescent lights in your theater dimmed perceptibly when you struck the projection arc, and brightened again when you cut it off. What would you conclude from this, and what tests and measurements would you make in order to locate the trouble? Suppose the incandescents burned to c. p., when you struck the projection arc, or even when both arcs were struck, but at a certain time each evening they dimmed, and at fairly regular time would brighten up again, and that during this period the striking of your projection arc also affected the incandescents. What would you conclude from this? Suppose the dimming and brightening to be frequent, and at irregular intervals, and of varied amount. What would you conclude from this?

The Answer:

I will answer this question in three parts.

First: The dimming of the incandescents when the arc is struck would indicate too great a drop in voltage somewhere, probably between the supply mains and the theater distributing board. To test this, assuming the normal required voltage at the distributing board to be 110, I would take the voltage across the street mains supplying the house with all of the theater lights burning, and if I found this to be normal, it would indicate the source of supply to be ample, and limit the trouble to the theater and its wires from the street mains. On the other hand, if I found the voltage to be very much below 110, say 107, I would conclude the trouble was in the source of supply, or, at least, part of it was there. If the voltage was found to be 110 or more I would then take the voltage at the board with all the incandescents and arc burning, and if I found the voltage to be, say 5 volts less than it was before, this would indicate $\frac{5}{112} = .0445$ per cent. drop, whereas it should not be more than 3 per cent. In this case the trouble would be in our theater supply wires. I would then proceed to measure their length, from the street mains to the distributing board. Suppose I found this to be 200 feet, and that I was using a total of 70 amperes, and, in order to make easy figuring, suppose the normal voltage to be 112. Three per cent. of 112 gives 3.36 as the allowable voltage drop. Then by the formula $\frac{21.6 \times D \times I}{e} = \text{C. M. Area}$, or substituting figures $\frac{21.6 \times 200 \times 70}{3.36} = 90{,}000$ C. M. Area, or 300 C. M. diameter, or, No. 1 wires; meaning by this, that it would require a No. 1 wire to convey 70 amperes 200 feet with 3 per cent. drop. Having made these calculations, I would then measure my supply wires and compare results. If the wires proved to be less than No. 1, then they should be either supplemented by other, smaller, wires, in multiple, or with larger wires.

Second: If the incandescents burned to c. p. when the projection arc was struck, or even when both arcs were struck, but at a certain time each evening they dimmed, and at a fairly regular time would brighten up again, this would indicate that the circuit supplying the theater did not have wire of sufficient size to supply its field at the peak load without excessive drop in voltage. To keep within the calculated voltage drop it requires a large amount of extra copper to carry the peak load, and, as the peak load may only last a short time each day, power companies usually are inclined to use smaller wire than that required to keep at all times within the calculated voltage drop. For efficient service the voltage should not vary more than two per cent. from normal. The incandescents brightening up again, but dimming when the arc was struck, would indicate that the peak load was decreased somewhat, through not sufficiently enabling the wires to take care of the projection arc without pulling down the voltage.

Third: I would conclude that motors, arc lamps, or other current consumers were being cut in or out of the circuit somewhere on the same feeders supplying my theater, though the trouble might possibly be due to poor regulation at the generator, or a poorly-designed distributing system, or the power plant too small to supply the circuit, as is frequently the case in small towns. This answer is for d. c. only.

[Without going extensively into this matter it might be stated that, while Brother Solar is correct as far as he goes, he does not go far enough, and, moreover, taking his own figures in a recently-answered question (51, I think it was) 3 per cent. drop would be very expensive to the light company, though that, of course, need not worry the theater operator or manager. With an a. c. system some of the reasons for these various phenomena might be due to an overloaded transformer. One correspondent, Brother Stewart, suggested the possibility of what is known as the swinging short accounting for the dimming of the lights. This would hardly be possible, because a swinging short, which means insulated slack wires swinging together somewhere, probably through the action of the wind, would, in all human probability, pull the circuit breaker on d. c., or the transformer fuse on a. c., or if it did not do this, the effect would be a winking of the lights, rather than a dimming. Ed.]

Primary Class.

Arthur O. Ward, Los Angeles, California, wants to know which is the best way to set the carbons.

I cannot take up space answering questions of this kind for an operator in a city as large as Los Angeles. If friend Ward desires to know this he will find it fully, thoroughly, and completely explained and illustrated in the Handbook, where the setting of carbons takes up a space of eight pages. The question of the angle of the carbons has long since been relegated to the kindergarten department, though the question of the size of carbons for various amperage is still a very live issue, as is also the chemical composition of carbons.

He Says I Am Wrong.

John Griffiths, Ansonia, Connecticut, writes:

I was somewhat amused at your comments on the query of George Gernod, page 331, issue October 17th. I know you well enough to know you will not mind being set right in this matter. It has been unquestionably proven that light rays have propelling power, though not to anything like the extent of turning a wheel such as Mr. Gernod suggests. But if the aforesaid wheel were built exceedingly light, mounted somewhat like a sensitive galvanometer needle and situated in a vacuum, then the beam of light would rotate the same, provided the wheel had an equal number of vanes, say four or six, and further provided that one side of each vane be silvered and the other dead black, so that one silver vane and one black vane were exposed to the light simultaneously. We would then have a duplicate of Sir William Crook's radiometer, a scientific instrument which > revolves by the action of light. The proposition, however, would be like getting a 1,000 h.p. engine to drive a toy dynamo. When I use the term light I include both the visible and the invisible ray. I was mildly corrected some time ago for omitting to mention the invisible part of a light beam. The rotation of the radiometer is due to the silver vein reflecting the light, and the black vein absorbing the same.

Well, brother Griffiths, I had already been corrected on that particular proposition, but I am not altogether satisfied that my comment was not literally correct. Frankly, I don't know, and am only viewing the matter from the standpoint of horse sense. If light had real, bonifide propelling power, even in infinitesimal amount, the enormous amount of light which strikes the earth's surface ought to, it seems to me, affect the earth's orbit in the course of time, and, moreover, what I said was that a feather would not be moved a millionth part of an inch, and according to your own statement it won't either. Now, I may be right and I may be wrong, but just viewing the matter purely from the standpoint of reasonableness, not at all questioning the correctness of the experiment you cite, I am not convinced that that particular experiment has proven that light has propelling power in the true sense of the word. It seems to me as though there might be another explanation for a phenomenon of that kind. Of course, Brother Griffiths, I don't pretend to have any actual scientific knowledge on things of this kind. All I can do is to look at it from what seems to be the common sense viewpoint. No, I not only am not offended at being set right in anything, or by having one who sees things differently argue the matter, but if I am wrong I want to be set right. I think you thoroughly understand that, and hope all other readers do also.

Old Timer Honored.

W. B. Moore, Albuquerque, New Mex., commonly known as "Spot" Moore, one of the old timers who has been connected with matters theatrical in Albuquerque for lo these many years, has been appointed projection machine operator for the New Mexico Board of Exposition Managers at the New Mexico Building, San Diego, Cal., 1915. Brother Moore is very proud of his selection, as well he may be.

He worked as operator at the Crystal theater for thirty-nine months without missing a show.

Friend Moore is something of a character and is well known to theatrical people who make the Albuquerque circuit. We congratulate him on his selection to this important position.

Statements Disputed.

On page 58, October 3d issue, appears an editorial, "Proposed State Law," in which certain statements and certain comments are made, some of which are now disputed by J. J. Corcoran, Troy, N. Y., president of Local 285.

Now, the editor made the statements referred to on the authority of delegates to the convention, and he had no reason to presume they were anything else than correct. Friend Corcoran says that the State Federation of Labor did not take any action which could be construed as meaning the adoption of a state license law, but that the resolution adopted by the State Federation of Labor was to amend the present law, which now reads: First-class cities only, so that all cities and towns in the State would be included. Brother Corcoran also calls my attention to the fact "Smith of Buffalo," as I had it, should have been H. J. Smith, Rochester; he also says that Brother Smith did not tell his local that he was going to get a universal state law which would allow any operator in the State of New York to operate in any city therein, as I was told he did. Brother Corcoran also denies that the up-state delegates were opposed to the apprenticeship idea, and asserts that "Willie, the usher," up-state, is just as competent as "Jimmie, the usher," New York City.

Now, the editor received his information from three different sources, but that, after all, does not, of course, prove anything, and, inasmuch as Brother Corcoran is very positive in his statements, we will accept his version as correct, and will also add that we are very glad indeed to know that things are not as we set them forth. I am particularly pleased to know that the up-state men are not opposed to the apprenticeship clause, because, as I look at it, opposition would be nothing in the world but rank foolishness.

In a later issue the editor printed a copy of the proposed law sent in by a local from up-state, and commented somewhat caustically upon the same. We are now informed that the I. A. delegates to the convention meet and appoint a committee of three to draft a law to be presented before the convention for its approval, the committee being composed of H. J. Smith, Rochester; E. DeCosta, 306, New York City, and Harold Williams, 35, New York City, the last-named being chairman, and that the result of the labors of this committee was the bill I criticised, except that one or two additions were made to adapt it to local conditions. Brother Corcoran says: "Now, I don't wish to be misunderstood in this matter. I was one of the delegates, and thought we were doing a splendid thing in the adoption of that bill. In conclusion, I again ask you to correct the errors in the article in October 3d issue. Your editorial was read by every operator worthy of the name, and, in consequence, the up-state delegates and Willie, the usher, in general are getting panned as men not willing to stand on their merits, while you extol the New York City operators as champions of all. Local 285 has a school for its members, and we hope in this manner to educate them so that when called upon to take an examination they can pass the same with credit to the union, and, not by way of intending to soften your heart at all, our text book is the Handbook."

Friend Corcoran said a great deal more, but the above I think fairly sets forth the gist of the matter. He has, to a certain extent, misunderstood our intention. We have no design of setting up New York City operators as champions of all; also, we fully agree that Jimmie the Usher, of New York City, is no more competent than Willie the Usher, of up-state. Our whole desire, all the way through, has been to agitate for a competent state law, and to point out, in good, plain language, the utter foolishness, and worse than foolishness of attempting to (a) draft a law without first having very carefully considered and weighed the various clauses to be incorporated; (b) without having carefully considered the probable view the courts will take of the various clauses of the proposed law; (c) without having first secured competent aid in the framing of the law; (d) without first securing the agreement of locals in the state to accept the provisions of the proposed law, as a whole, and to work for its adoption by our law makers and its signing by the governor.

Our criticism of the bill was made without knowledge of its having been the work of the State Federation of Labor committee. Had we known that fact why our criticism would undoubtedly have been much more severe, particularly in view of the fact that two members of the committee were New York City men, who should have known better than to have attempted such a thing without first having given the matter very, very careful consideration, a great deal of thought, and having secured the aid of some one competent to draft a law which would at least not contain glaring absurdities, such, for instance, as the "inspection of operators" item.

I cordially thank the Brother for having corrected the statements in the article in question. Brother Corcoran informs me that he is thoroughly in favor of a state law, and that he realizes that such a law could not be possible with examining boards in every city.

Gears Grind.

B. L. Whitney, Truman, Minnesota, says

> The gears of my Power's Six A, a new machine, grind when the framing lever is central. Would appreciate any suggestions as to a remedy.

If you are the possessor of a Handbook, as you certainly ought to be, I would refer you to instructions Nos. 23 and 24, pages 273 and 275. I cannot use valuable space in this department to set forth in detail, instructions which are contained in elaborate form in the Handbook. You may say that this is trying to force you to buy a Handbook. Well, you can look at it that way if you want to, and, moreover, for your own good I would be perfectly willing to force you to do that very thing, even as I would be willing to force every operator in the country to do the same thing. If you think my desire to do this is based altogether on finances, why, I cannot help that, but the fact remains that your assumption would not be true. The seat of your trouble lies in the fact that the small toggle gear between fly wheel pinion and your back gear is too tight against one of the other of these gears, or possibly against both. I do not know what kind of gear the Power Company is now using, but sometimes rawhide and fibre gears will swell and cause this sort of trouble. If it is an all-metal gear train, then the fault would seem to be due to lack of proper inspection at the factory, but I do not think this is the case, as the Power inspection is usually very thorough.

Condenser Combination.

Stanley Levi, Victoria, British Columbia, says:

> I have taken note of all the many useful things in the department for a long time past. I now ask you to put me right with regard to condensers. Am running a road show, using an Edison Exhibition Model; my present condensing lenses being of the cheap kind. My objective is 4 inches e.f., giving an 8-foot picture at 40 feet. I use ozo carbi light with guil pastil, and an ordinary heavy white-sheet screen. Results are fairly satisfactory. What I wish to know is this: If I were to substitute a 6½ meniscus and a 7½ bi-convex, putting the 6½ meniscus next to the light, would it improve the result? Or what can you suggest to improve things?

In the first place, Brother Levi, if you have the regular aperture plate you have got nearer a 5 than a 4-inch e.f. objective—about 4¾. As to the Meniscus-bi-convex, I could not say positively whether the focal lengths named would give the best results or not, but if I were doing it I would take a chance and try it out. I would either write to the Laemmle Film Service, Minneapolis, or the Kleine Optical Company, Chicago, give them the size of picture and length of throw, and tell them to send the meniscus-bi-convex combination which would best suit the objective you are using, but be sure to measure the exact throw and width of picture when you do it. You will, of course, be taking a chance in this proposition, but I think it will work out very well.

Life of Rectifier Tube.

A. Dittman, Brownsville, Texas, says:

> Am using a G. E. rectifier. Have always had two tubes in use, changing occasionally. Finally it got to the point where it was necessary to assist the lighting of the tube by raising the plunger on the relay coil, or at least by raising this plunger up and down the rectifier worked. Finally one of the tubes was broken by accident and a new one bought, and when placed on the rectifier the same worked without any assistance, or the lifting of the plunger, whereas the old one I still have needs this assistance. The light of the old tube, however, is just as good as that of the new one, only it will not start so readily. Query: Is the fault all in the tube or in the starting or relay magnets? When is a rectifier dead?

A rectifier tube is never "dead" as long as it is possible to start it. It is quite possible, nowever, that with continued use the vacuum of the tube will in time, become low, which operates to make the mercury sluggish, with result that it is rather hard to start the tube. On the other hand, a new tube, with high vacuum, would start without any trouble. As long as a tube will operate at all there is no difference whatever in the result at the arc as between the old tube and a new one.

Cause of Film Injury.

M. F. Walker, manager of Opera House, Cadiz, Ohio, says:

> With relation to damaged film submitted to you by S. B. Lewis, Winchester, Ky., and your request for information, page 1,238, August 29th issue, I will submit my opinion on this matter, having noticed the theory advanced by R. G. Hawkins, Lincoln, Cal., together with your comment, page 330, October 17th issue. In the first place, Mr. Lewis says that after careful examination of the machine, everything seems to be O. K. Now, if Mr. Lewis' machine had been in perfect condition no such damage could have been done to the film without being observed on the screen; also, it seems to me there is only one way in which the film could be damaged without the machine projecting a somewhat shaky picture. My solution is as follows: By lowering one end of the intermittent sprocket shaft and elevating the other the intermittent sprocket would be thrown out of alignment with relation to the film and aperture. Then while the sprocket holes on one side would mesh all right, those on the other side certainly could not, and under such conditions the film might run and the trouble not be noticed by some operators, though the film would be more or less damaged, according to the tension of the intermittent idler. There could be a second state of affairs, viz.: The film could be placed against the intermittent sprocket so that neither side would mesh, and then Mr. Hawkins could yank one side into mesh without altering the other side. Of course, that would change the sound of the machine, and, as Mr. Hawkins says, a good operator would detect it.

No, Brother Walker, I cannot see it your way. The mystery still remains to be unsolved. All you say is quite true, but I think this would not account for the indentations being, for a considerable distance, exactly midway between the sprocket holes on one side. You could not possibly run a film through a machine, I think, with the film that much out of alignment with the sprocket, nor could you get the sprocket itself out of line sufficient to accomplish an injury of this kind. Of course, if the sprocket itself were badly out of line, and the film also out of line the other way, it would help, but personally I cannot see any way in which the injury shown could be done. It has always been a puzzle to me and it still is one, though I thank you for submitting your view.

Film Injury Again.

Toronto, Canada, says:

> Just read Hawkins' theory, page 330, October 17th issue. I have had this same trouble myself, and it is possible to run a film on a Simplex in such manner that the sprocket teeth will cut between the holes on one side. It is the intermittent sprocket which does this, and it don't show on the screen at all. In case the film is damaged in this manner who is to blame? The trouble always starts at a bad patch in the film and the only way to be sure the film is traveling as it should travel is to stop every few minutes, open the machine and look, and, moreover, if the operator has to keep his eyes constantly on the machine, what will happen on the screen? Can you tell me why so many splices are made in the Lubin films? I recently ran one in which not less than eighty-five splices jumped the picture out of frame, and it was not an old film either. Sometime since you mentioned a lamp or lamp house which could be used without condensers. Will you give me a description of it. Kindly omit my name and the name of the machine, and you must not judge all Toronto men by the actions of a few. The trouble is that there are a lot of operators who don't know half what they ought and being too lazy to study, they adopt the "dog-in-the-manger attitude."

As regards the request to suppress the name of the Simplex, why there would not be any earthly reason in publishing the matter with the name of the machine omitted. If a Simplex will commit this sort of misdemeanor, then that fact ought to be made known and the trouble promptly looked into and remedied. But, my brother, with all due respect to you I have very serious doubts as to whether the Simplex, or any other machine for that matter, could or would do this—at least wether the intermittent sprocket could or would. I cannot see how films could go through a machine with one side almost one-eighth of an inch higher than the other at the intermittent sprocket. Frankly, I would have to be shown that particular proposition before I would believe it. It seems to me that the Simplex would be no more likely to do a thing of this kind than any other machine; in fact, if I believed it of any machine I would rather think the Powers' would do it then the Simplex, for the film is not so closely confined in the Power's Six, but as a matter of fact the Power's don't do it, and cannot do it. I think, my friend, that while you unquestionably are honest in your belief, you are in error in this matter. I want some of the boys who have samples of films damaged in that way to send them in, and I will take them to the manufacturers and see what they have to say about it. The illustration shows how the film was damaged, the dots representing minute indentations.

As to the substitute for condensers, it was a metal parabolic reflector somewhat similar to the headlight of a locomotive. It gave a beautiful light, but so far it has not proven commercially practicable. It was called the Boylite Concentrator.

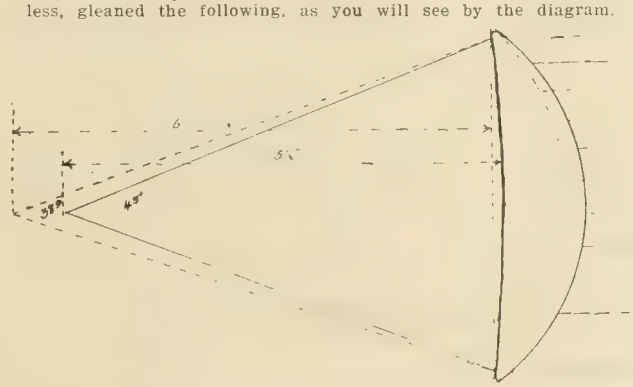
As to the Toronto boys, I think your statement is probably nothing more than the even and exact truth. The same condition obtains in many other cities. There is a dog-in-the-manger element among operators, just the same as there is amongst other professions, who are too shiftless and too lazy to study and improve themselves. Naturally they do not want to see anybody else advance in knowledge, since that would place them in a very bad position and force them to get busy, therefore they oppose anything and everything which tends to educate the operator and improve projection. They don't care a mouldy doughnut about the good of the business as a whole. They would like to get better salaries, yes, provided they can get them without any added exertion. The business would be better off without them. Neither this department or its editor asks any odds of that particular brand of operator, and they are entirely at liberty to go as far as they like. Their humble efforts have not amounted to anything in the past, and won't in the future. Taken as a whole I have no doubt but that the Toronto men will compare favorably with the men of other cities, both in ability and progressiveness.

With regard to the Lubin splices, why this matter is respectfully referred to that company. If you mean a new Lubin film had that many factory-made misframed splices, why that almost seems impossible, and the film should promptly have been returned to the manufacturer, since some assembler made a colossal blunder. So far as I know the Lubin films are, on the whole, as well put together and have no more splices than those of other companies.

Meniscus Condensers.

John Griffiths, Ansonia, Connecticut, is here again with the following, and, by-the-way, let me say that Brother Griffiths' letters are always interesting and instructive, He says:

> I agree with you with regard to working with a spot of ample size; it has much to do with securing satisfactory results on the screen. I have lately installed a new Standard machine with modern condenser mount, and they are very convenient for experimental work. The more I experiment the more I find I have to learn. Without doubt this condenser proposition will get cleared up after awhile. The Laemmle people have sent me a set of meniscus-bi-convex condensers, and, while I have not as yet made any exhaustive tests with them, I have, nevertheless, gleaned the following, as you will see by the diagram.



> First I find that the 6½ meniscus projects parallel rays when the arc is 5½ inches from the condensers, whereas, with the 6½ plano-convex the arc must be 6 inches away. One would naturally infer from this that the meniscus was not a 6½-inch lens, but, as a matter of fact, the change is due to the concave side, having the effect of advancing the optical center to a point nearly outside the lens. So far as the operator be concerned the 6½ meniscus is merely an improved 5½ plano-convex. The improvement consists in hollowing out the plano side of the lens to a depth of ⅛ of an inch, and this makes the 5½ plano-convex into a 6½ meniscus. Outside of the advantages gained by this process we are, to all intents and purposes, using a 5½ plano-convex lens. So far as the bi-convex condensers be concerned, there are no differences with regard to size. A 7½ plano-convex gives the same results as a 7½ bi-convex, not, however, taking into consideration the quality of the light, their radius of curvature being double that of the plano-convex. In using the tables we would have to consider a 7½-inch meniscus as the equal of the 6½ plano-convex. When the boys are all through with tables we can draw up a new set, making allowances for the different amperages and different condensers. In the sketch the dotted lines is the plano-convex 6½ and the solid lines the meniscus 5½. The meniscus gives a gain of 11.7 per cent. in light, but there is an extra thickness of glass 3/64 of an inch, which, to some extent, offsets this. By advancing the arc with the plano-convex to coincide with the meniscus position, little gain would be registered, because the rays would diverge and be absorbed by the condenser mount. Thus we have a distinct gain of light with the meniscus by advancing the arc the amount of the concave depth, ⅛ of an inch, and, also owing to the plano-convex having a more diverging beam of light.

Brother James happened into the office and I showed him this letter. He remarked that he thoroughly agreed with all that friend Griffiths said. For myself, I have come to the conclusion that I now know what is wanted, and the matter of condensers will never be settled until we have it. I think I named this once before, but I will again. Taking a 5-inch objective lens for example; we will have to have a condenser combination worked out for the different conditions under which that lens will work, for instance: if it is projecting a picture 50 feet, 55, 60, 65, and so on, up to a point where a 20-foot picture is reached, or possibly a 22-foot picture, and this will have to be done with every objective from, say, 2½ e. f. to the longest lens used. It is some job, yes, but the editor is taking steps whereby he hopes to get this very thing done.

Spot at the Aperture.

J. N. Highswandi, Eugene, Oregon, has an idea for a simple variable speed motor drive, which he says might be made by any operator of ordinary mechanical ability; also he has ideas on the size of the spot, as follows:

> In October 17th issue I note an article relating to size of spot at the aperture, and I am in full accord with the ideas therein expressed. I once worked under a manager who objected to large size of spot I carried, as he thought it was too great a waste of light. To draw the arc back, however, and make the spot smaller, caused a loss of some light by diverging rays going outside the condensers, which was gathered by the lenses when the arc was closer. Actual experiments proved that the small spot showed a slightly brighter field in the center of the screen, with discoloration at the edges and corners, whereas the large spot gave a perfectly clear field.

The brother has, in the main, the right idea, but he overlooked the fact that the small spot requires a different condenser combination from its larger brother, when working under identical conditions. Yellowing of the edges of his light was possibly due to the fact that his condenser combination was not of the right focal length to fit the objective under the conditions under which it was working. However, the fact remains that under any conditions the light will not be as pure where the small spot is used as it will with the larger one, but in changing from the small to the large spot the focal length of the condensers must be changed, else the definition on the screen will be injured.

The belt shifter you sent in was illustrated in another form long ago. In fact, it is illustrated on page 371 of the second edition of the Handbook. However, I am publishing the same because it is a thoroughly practical device, and you have it in excellent form.

New Simplex Equipment.

The Precision Machine Company, New York City, is on the market with a new $300, 1915, projector. The general plan of the machine is not altered. The magazines, however, are drawn in two pieces of No. 18 gauge steel, with an inside diameter of 16 inches. The magazine hinges are of malleable strap iron, with spiral springs, which meets the underwriters' requirements on motor-driven projectors. The magazine latch is an improved type made of spring steel. In the door of the upper magazine is a glass window 3 x 4 inches in which is embedded ¼-inch mesh wire. The center of this window is located 3 inches under the reel center, the design being to enable the operator to see the exact amount of film left on the upper reel without the necessity of opening the magazine door. The regular equipment will have a belt drive, but for $4.50 additional to the list price of the complete machine a chain drive take-up will be provided, the chain being ⅛ inch wide with hardened steel blocks and breaking strain of 300 pounds. The sprockets of the machine are case hardened. The stereo objective is a half size achromatic two-lens single combination. At the option of the purchaser either a No. 1 Gundlach or one of the new large-diameter crown motion picture objective lenses will be supplied. If a No. 2 Gundlach is ordered with the machine in lieu of the regular lens, the cost will be ten dollars additional to the list price of the complete machine. The capacity of the grid rheostat supplied with the Simplex has been increased from 45 to 50 amperes, to conform to the new code allowance of 50 amperes for a No. 6 B. & S. wire. If a 220-volt rheostat is desired it will be furnished with the equipment at twelve dollars additional.

Serve an Apprenticeship.

Chicago, Illinois, contributes the following rather queer letter.

> I wish to ask you for some information. I am an operator and am having trouble securing work. There are two unions here in Chicago, one called a "Fink" Union, it not being affiliated with the A. F. of L.; the other is the Moving Picture Operators, Local No. 2, of the I. A. T. S. E., which is affiliated with the A. F. of L. They have No. 2 men in most of the theaters, and I would like to get into that local, but cannot pass their examination. The other union wants me to join with them, and they will take me without any examination, but they have no jobs except the theaters that have always been Fink. Now, what would you advise me to do? Join the Fink Union, or, do you think it best to take a course in some school, or get work in some theater as an apprentice, get more experience, and try to join Local No. 2?

I presume "Fink" is some local colloquialism meaning non-union. It seems to me, my friend, the very fact that you cannot pass the No. 2 examination is prima facie evidence that you are not competent; also, the very fact that this "Fink" Union will take you without any examination ought to be enough to cause any sane man to reject their proposition, even laying aside the question of their being a union at all, which, in the true sense they are not. Local Union No. 2, according to all reports, leaves a great, great many things to be desired. If reports from the Windy City are anything even faintly resembling the truth, Local No. 2 requires a great deal of fixing before it could by any stretch of imagination be called an ideal union. But, nevertheless, it is the body for you to affiliate with, and your only right course is to get a position in some theater in, or near, Chicago, and serve an apprenticeship, combining practical experience with study until you can pass any competent examination by reason of the fact that you are the possessor of real knowledge. This "Fink" Union you speak of is entitled to no recognition of any sort whatsoever.

New Theater Data.

F. H. Daley, Bird Island, Minnesota, writes:

> We are remodeling a building to be used as a photoplay theater, and, having encountered difficulties, we come to you, hoping you will advise. Can a hot-air furnace be used for heating purposes, or would heat waves interfere with the picture? What size picture do you advise, the throw being 65 feet? We will have an aisle in the center of the room and intended having a register in this aisle, the operating room being at the back end of the aisle, but it strikes me that perhaps, heat waves would interfere with the projection. What about this?

With regard to the heat waves, you need have no fear, as they will not in the least interfere with the projection, since light is not affected by air currents, and heat waves are colorless. As to the size of the picture, I could not advise intelligently without first seeing a ground plan of your auditorium. Broadly speaking, however, I should say a 16-foot picture would be ample.

Comments on the Films

Licensed

THE HERITAGE OF HAMILTON CLEEK (Edison), Nov. 10.—Thirteenth of the series in the "Chronicles of Cleek," by Thomas W. Hanshew, featuring Benjamin F. Wilson, who is supported by an excellent cast. Both the interior and exterior scenes in this picture are more than ordinarily elaborate and the photography is splendid. There are some very thrilling scenes, especially where the Apaches abduct Cleek's prospective bride (Gertrude McCoy). The acting is well done. A most interesting release.

WITHIN THREE HUNDRED PAGES (Essanay), Nov. 10.—Adapted from a Munsey Magazine story, and it makes quite a thrilling picture drama, with a well sustained mystery. It concerns a priceless necklace which has been stolen. It is quite interesting to the spectator to see how a newspaper reporter humiliates the chief of detectives in unraveling the mystery and in recovering the gems. An unlooked for surprise in the finale adds great interest to this release.

THE WIDOW'S MIGHT (Kalem), Nov. 10.—A farce comedy, featuring John E. Brennan, supported by Fred Hornby, Ethel Teare and Pearl Elmore. There are many laughable situations in this offering in which love cuts the main figure, on the part of an impressionable tailor (Mr. Brennan), who before the finish receives the "Widow's Might." It is a laugh creator.

BUTT-ING IN (Lubin), Nov. 10.—Written and produced by Arthur D. Hotaling. A rough and tumble farce, the cast of which is made up of colored artists. On the same reel with "A Bargain Table Cloth."

A BARGAIN TABLE CLOTH (Lubin), Nov. 10.—On the same reel with "Butt-ing In." A comedy that is provocative of more than the usual amount of mirth, concerning table cloths of the same pattern, which involves several families in trouble. Fred M. Hayn is the author and J. A. Murphy, producer.

THE RANGER'S ROMANCE (Selig), Nov. 10.—A western picture drama which Tom Mix has produced and in which he plays the leading part of the "Ranger," and how he succeeds in winning a frontier bride in "Sally" (Goldie Colwell). The characters are made up of cattle rustlers and illicit whiskey sellers. There are several thrilling scenes on the prairie, including a running fight with the Indians. Fair for this sort of picture.

ANDY FALLS IN LOVE (Edison), Nov. 11.—Twelfth in the Adventures of Andy, written by Mark Swan. Andy's mother discovers that "something is the matter with Andy" and she gives him a dose of home made remedy to straighten him out. Then she discovers that he is taking pride in his personal appearance, even to shining up his shoes—Andy is in love and the sacrifices that he makes and the deeds of daring he performs for the sake of the object of his affections are most laughable.

THREE BOILED DOWN FABLES (Essanay), Nov. 11.—Three George Ade comedies on one reel—this is a special bargain. Take a look at the titles, "The House Comedian," "Why Essie's Friend Got the Fresh Air" and "The Prevailing Craze." Either one of the three is alone worth the price of admission.

PEGGY, OF PRIMROSE LANE (Selig), Nov. 11.—There is nothing very new in the construction of the plot of this picture, although Maibelle Heikes Justice, has cleverly used an old theme in a fairly original manner and E. J. Le Saint has handled it in good shape. It is the story of a stage struck girl, who meets with the usual adventures in the city, becomes discouraged and goes back home to marry her old sweetheart. The cast is a good one and the picture is about an average one.

IN BRIDAL ATTIRE (Vitagraph), Nov. 11.—Quite a clever comedy although somewhat trite, concerning the troubles of a prospective bridegroom (Billy Quirk), he tears his vest, falls off a trolley car and chases his intended on a motor-cycle. He finally arrives in a dilapidated state, just in time to prevent his girl from running away from herself. He grabs a preacher, is married and draws a long breath. It is all very laughable.

THE FLEUR-DE-LIS RING (Biograph), Nov. 12.—A costume picture which develops a very enticing story, that reminds one of the old fashioned Irish or English dramas. Beautiful exterior scenes pertain in this production and the photography is wonderful. Alfred Paget, Isabel Rea, Jack Drumier, Ivan Christy, Hector V. Sarno and Thornton Cole make up the principals in the cast. Miss Rea does splendid work and Mr. Cole, in an unusual character make-up, deserves mention. A very pleasing picture.

SOPHIE AND THE MAN OF HER CHOICE (Essanay), Nov. 12.—This Victor Potel comedy is of about the same calibre as the others of the series preceding it, showing how Sophie saves Slippery Slim from his foes by a clever ruse and becomes his wife, to the consternation of Mustang Pete and old Hiram Clutts. It is received with great laughter.

LOLA THE RAT (Vitagraph), Nov. 12.—A drama of the order which seems to be a favorite with the producers now-a-days, introducing the gang element. Although it is splendidly acted there is a lack of the convincing quality. The melodramatic scenes have a smack of claptrap. It can be classed as about an average release.

HAM, THE PIANO MOVER (Kalem), Nov. 13.—A very laughable comedy written and directed by Marshal Neilan, featuring Ruth Roland and Lloyd V. Hamilton. Bud Duncan, as Ham's assistant comes in for quite a heavy part (the piano). He does all the work with the aid of Ham's moral support and kind advice. This is a very amusing release, devoid of rough and tumble actions.

THE TRAP (Lubin), Nov. 13.—A story of Mexican treachery, involving the commandant of a Mexican military post, his daughter, a captain attached to the post and a young American traveler. Velma Whitman, W. W. Campbell, L. C. Shumway, George Routh and many others make up the cast. An elopement across the border is the leading feature. Many attractive scenes which are well photographed, with commendable acting make this release enjoyable.

CUPID TURNS THE TABLES (Selig), Nov. 13.—A farce comedy depicting how a widow to save herself from many admirers, disguises herself as a spinster and by accident wins a wealthy old woman-hater from all the other admiring females, who have driven him to that condition. John Lancaster and Lyllian Brown Leighton are the principals. E. Lynn Sommers is the author and Norval MacGregor, producer. This number is received with hearty laughter.

THE ROCKY ROAD OF LOVE (Vitagraph), Nov. 13.—This might be captioned a courtship under difficulties. Flora Finch and Jay Dwiggins are the main laugh producers. Every scene contains ludicrous situations, devoid of triteness. There is a fire scene that is a howler, in which the loving couple gets soaked thoroughly—by the firemen. This is one of the best comedies issued by the Vitagraph company in some time, and is thoroughly enjoyable.

LIFE'S STREAM (Biograph), Nov. 13.—If this release possesses no other attractive qualities for the average spectator, it cannot be gainsaid that the backgrounds are not uniquely pleasing, especially the waterfall, which figures in several of the scenes. Contrasting conditions existing in this plot, embrace those of the country and city, make an interesting picture. Those in the cast have given a faithful representation of the characters to which they have been assigned. A worthy and enjoyable release.

HELEN'S SACRIFICE (Kalem), Nov. 14.—First Episode of "The Hazards of Helen." This picture has been reviewed at length by Hanford C. Judson, in the Moving Picture World, and can be found on page 913, issue of Nov. 14, 1914.

HIS WIFE'S PET (Biograph), Nov. 14.—An amusing comedy which has been well made, concerning a wife whom a husband imagines thinks more of her cat than she does of him. An incident occurs which gives him an opportunity to "almost" get away with it. He has an awful time, but the cat comes back. A rapid fire comedy. On the same reel with "The Deadly Dispatch."

THE DEADLY DISPATCH (Biograph), Nov. 14.—On the same reel with "His Wife's Pet." A broad burlesque on the "spy system" used by different countries during the time of war. There is much that is ludicrous and a great deal that is very laughable. An ambassador's ball scene is finely costumed. There is a fine surprise at the denoument.

LONCHO BILLY'S DECISION (Essanay), Nov. 14.—A western drama featuring G. M. Anderson, not as a gun man, but in a vastly different character, which he sustains very pleasingly. The story concerns the "right of way" of a projected railroad. There are some very touching scenes which are well handled by Mr. Anderson and Marguerite Clayton. Some good photography of beautiful scenes with the acting make this an interesting and pleasing visual story.

BEATING THE BURGLAR (Lubin), Nov. 14.—On the same reel with "Magazine Cooking," a comedy by Fred H. Hayn, containing many inconsistent scenes in which the laughs are spoiled by introducing too much that is absurd. It does not create any great amount of enthusiasm.

MAGAZINE COOKING (Lubin), Nov. 14.—A very enjoyable little comedy which is presented in a very natural manner and has the merit of being reasonable in plot and direction; also the acting is well done. There is a laughable surprise at the very end. J. A. Murphy is author and producer. On the same reel with "Beating the Burglar."

THE FATAL NOTE (Selig), Nov. 14.—A comedy drema that tells the story of a married couple's fifth wedding anniversary and how they almost came not celebrating it on account of the fool husband, who got up on his hind legs for nothing. It does look for a short time as though he had cause to become peeved, but in the finale he is forced to "eat crow." James Oliver Curwood is author and E. A. Martin producer, with Adele Lane Edwin Wallock leading artists. They combine to make of this a rattling offering.

MAKING OF A NEWSPAPER (Vitagraph), Nov. 14.—This is an educational feature that should be seen by everyone. It is the manufacture of a large city daily newspaper, with illustrative scenes, not only in the mechanical departments, but the editors, managers, and reporters at their desks. It was taken in the offices of what is said to be the largest and best equipped plant in the world, "The Los Angeles Examiner." It gives the layman an insight into the immense amount of labor involved to furnish him with the latest news at the breakfast table.

THE CHILD THOU GAVEST ME (Biograph), Nov. 16.—A picture drama that contains and displays the inborn maternal instinct of those who are possessed with such attributes. The plot concerns two families, who are intimate friends, the heads of each are fishermen and the complications existing in the plot are thrilling and enticing. The ending scenes are wholesome and satisfactory. Charles H. West, Claire McDowell H. A. Barrows and Kate Bruce are the principals. The acting and the photography are first-class.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE LOST WIFE (Edison), Nov. 16.—The eleventh story of "Octavius—Amateur Detective," with the usual cast. This production is devoid of qualities that might be termed even interesting, and falls far short of the numbers which have preceded it, therefore little can be said, conscientiously, in its favor.

COUNTESS SWEEDIE (Essanay), Nov. 16.—In this comedy Sweedie poses as a real countess, but gets away with it only long enough to fall down stairs and do the Swedish tango, when the real countess arrives. The first scenes occur in Sweedie's "Hash-house," where she is the "whole thing" and asserts her prerogatives in a strenuous manner. She ends up in jail, but whistles through the bars that she was a Countess for a small time, anyway. A fine laugh producer.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 75 (Selig), Nov. 16.—The treasure ship Kronprinssen Cecilie sails into port safely; German ships being held in American ports till the end of war; little girls riding ponies in peace parade, Atlanta, Ga.; fight against cattle epidemic waging in United States at Jersey City; five thousand horses held at Chicago on account of foot disease, intended for shipment to Europe; shooting pigeons flying over Chicago stockyards, said to be conveyors of disease germs; scene at naval yards where the steamship Jason is being packed with Christmas presents for shipment to foreign children in the war zone, also truck loads of clothing passing through the streets of Boston for Belgian sufferers. War scenes in Belgium and France. Ending with numerous scenes of the New Jersey forest fires.

SISTERS (Vitagraph), Nov. 16.—A story of two girls who almost become the victims of two married scoundrels. The picture is an interesting one and should serve as a lesson to girls, but although the two girls belong to entirely different classes of society they assist each other in escaping from subsequent sorrow and degradation. Much human nature obtains in this picture. The acting of all in the cast is above the ordinary and it will entertain any audience.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 74 (Selig), Nov. 12.—Troops leaving Ft. Sheridan for miners' strike near Ft. Smith, Ark.; character study of Joseph E. Cannon; fox hunters of the Meadowbrook Hunt Club following the hounds; ship Massapequa chartered by John D. Rockefeller, with provisions for the relief of the starving Belgians; French naval marines on way to check the German advance; British retreating to Ostend; Belgian troops at Eecloo and Maldegen; Dutch guards examining passports of Belgian refugees; making heavy leather service coats for the English, in South Boston factory, three hundred thousand of these have been ordered.

Licensed Specials

THE NEW MAGDALEN (Biograph), Nov. 10.—Adapted from the novel by Wilkie Collins, in two parts. This book was dramatized and produced about forty years ago on the regular stage and was an unprecedented success. The visualized version has been very ably produced, with the exception of the costuming, in some instances. Much vividness is shown in the battle scenes. Louise Vale, in the exacting part of Mercy Merrick, brings out all the salient points of the character cameo like. In fact all the members of the cast are deserving of mention. A superior release.

THE SENATOR'S BROTHER (Vitagraph), Nov. 10.—A special feature picture in two parts, picturized by George Plympton from the magazine story by Gouveneur Morris. William Humphrey has produced it and plays the leading role (The Senator). Leah Baird plays a dual role opposite. The acting of all the artists appearing in this picture is most commendable. The general construction of the plot is such that a sustaining interest manifests itself throughout the two reels. This visualization can be classed as superior, in all respects.

A MIDNIGHT TRAGEDY (Kalem), Nov. 11.—A two-act picture play showing how, in the development of the story, a man sacrifices his future and happiness for the sake of a woman whom he loves, realizing that she loves another. The acting of all concerned in the cast is up to the standard mark. The story holds close attention and strengthens as it proceeds, in both suspense and sympathetic quality. A wholesome story that is visually well told.

THE QUACK (Lubin), Nov. 11.—A two-part picture drama which while not melodramatic, its story is a strong one. There are two or three thrilling scenes, one of which might be termed an unusual "punch." The satisfactory part of this plot is in the last scenes, where a disreputable father is brought to a realization of his neglect and selfishness, which causes the death of his own child. While this story is considerably morbid, its intensity holds close attention.

IN THE HILLS OF KENTUCKY (Lubin), Nov. 12.—A two-part picture with the majority of its scenes located in the mountains. Herman A. Blackman, has written a superior story and Edgar Jones has handled it cleverly. The characters are contrasting. Gilbert Ely renders a fine piece of work as "Blazer Hoadley," an old mountaineer. Edgar Jones and Louise Huff were also very impressive as Lafe and Roxie Herron, mountain people. In fact the whole cast does distinctive work. This picture is above the ordinary.

THE PRINCE PARTY (Essanay), Nov. 13.—A two-act picture drama featuring Francis X. Bushman, with Beverly Bayne as leading support. The plot is centered on the old theme of the ambitions of rich parents to marry one of their daughters to a man of royal blood; therefore they give a "Prince party" to which the Prince who is expected comes incog, disguised as a gentlemanly vagabond. Thrilling and exciting moments are embraced in the action and the outcome is satisfactory to the viewer. The acting is splendid. This is a highly entertaining offering, in every respect.

ANN, THE BLACKSMITH (Vitagraph), Nov. 14.—A special number in two parts, which features Anne Schaefer in the title role, in which she actually shoes a horse, the sheriff's horse at that, whom she afterwards wins as a husband. She also does several other things, such as cleaning up two desperatoes, establishing the innocence of her dissolute brother, who is accused of being a thief, etc. She is ably supported by a splendid cast, including Jack Mower, Alfred Vosburgh, Geo. Kunkel, Wm. Duncan and C. E. Thompson. Thrilling scenes, good photography and fine direction make of this an exceptional release.

IF I WERE YOUNG AGAIN (Selig), Nov. 16.—A picture fantasie in two parts, written by Gilson Willets, which is a weird story concerning a man, Curator of Anthropology in a great Museum, who is accidentally favored with the opportunity of becoming the possessor of the "Elixir of Youth." His experiences after partaking of a drop are quite interesting. Some of the details in this picture will not stand strong analysis, but demonstrate that youth and old age are separate parts which will not amalgamate. He finally concludes that the "old" way is the best way. It is well presented.

THE MAN OF IRON (Kalem), Nov. 16.—A modern two-act drama by Kate E. Horton, directed by Robert G. Vignola, with the cast made up of Henry Hallam, Helen Lindroth, Harry Millarde and Alice Hollister. The theme of this plot concerns a family which is governed by a father with an uncompromising disposition. His sternness drives his children to conditions which ultimately bring him to an admission that his conduct has caused all the misery attendant on the family. A very good picture, in all respects.

Independent

THE FOLLY OF ANNE (Majestic), Nov. 3.—A picture from the short story of Ellen Farley in "The Cavalier," and screened by John O Brian. The story is of a girl who tries to be an author and has the usual fate of such. The new interest comes when she enters the home of the publisher because the policemen won't let her sit on the park benches and she wants to hide out of sight of them. She is starving and there is fruit on the table which she eats, but when the "burglar" comes she feels in duty bound to protect the place from him—it is the publisher—and from this meeting the two young people fall in—it always happens in fiction, why say it? But even with this ending the offering has much to commend it. Able direction and good acting give it atmosphere and it will go all right.

A FORTUNE IN PANTS (Royal), Nov. 14.—A one-reel farce, featuring Louis Simon. The idea has only just been used by Melies, but both, on different programs, will find each a place. Such pictures are usually a bit coarse in places. This one shows how Simon, sent with a valuable diamond in his hip pocket, loses his pants while taking a bath in the hotel, and how he chases those pants till he finds them on an actor.

HOW HEROES ARE MADE (Keystone), Nov. 14.—A typical burlesque number in which the girl is pursued by an unwelcome suitor. He employs her sweetheart, unwittingly, to abduct her. The complications which follow are not extremely funny, but contain considerable amusement.

OUT AGAIN—IN AGAIN (Komic), Nov. 15.—A farce that is sure to make excellent entertainment. Its characters include Mrs. Henpeck (Fay Tincher) and her spouse (Ted Browning). Tamanny Young, a burglar, whose coming sadly mixes up a scrape into which Ted gets by his trick to have an evening out with the boys. Fay "is on," but she mistakes the real cops for Ted's friends and one and all land in front of the sergeant at the police station, and some of 'em have a good chance to be "looking out."

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, No. 44, (Reliance), Nov. 16.—In this number Margaret inspects new fashions in hats. Later a new plot feature is introduced, in which she visits a haunted house. The old woman's story proves interesting and has some novel points in it. This episode will be continued next week.

FATTY'S JONAH DAY (Keystone), Nov. 16.—While Fatty is reading "Three Weeks" with a girl in the park a rival appears. Trouble of course follows, in which two policemen participate. There is a dive from the park bridge and other stunts of this sort. This is a success of its type and well photographed.

WHEN QUEENIE CAME BACK (Beauty), Nov. 17.—A farce for civilized man—you will recall what some one has said about civilized man's being able to get along without books and things, but not without cooks. Queenie is a cook, an when she comes back they have a brass band at the station and give her a big parade through the city. Civilized woman will enjoy it as well and her husband, for it lets us into the state secrets of kitchen diplomacy and hints at scrap of paper treaties. It is a good offering, and will make laughter.

THE LITTLE COUNTRY MOUSE (Majestic), Nov. 17.—A well-staged little society number, in which Blanche Sweet plays a country girl at a house party. The unscrupulous hostess tries to fan up an interest in the girl on the part of a rake, because she is jealous. The young lieutenant saves her from a compromising situation. Mary Alden, Wallace Reid and W. A. Walsh are also in the cast.

BEPPO (American), Nov. 18.—An acceptable one-reel picture of sentiment with many pleasing scenes. It has plenty of children in it and the chief interest centers in Beppo, an Italian immigrant, and his little girl of about ten, who acts as his housekeeper. An American family has lost its only child. Beppo, through incompetence of police and judicial officers of the city is arrested on "suspicion" and held until he child, not knowing what has become of him and unable to support herself, is taken to an orphan home, from which the Americans adopt her. But her father gets out and the child hears his music across the lawn of her new parents. She runs to him. That is all, but it is pretty and many will enjoy it a good deal.

THE HIDDEN MESSAGE (Reliance), Nov. 18.—A Western offering in which two tramps kidnap a young girl and hold her father up for ransom. The girl writes a note at their demand, and indites a message under the stamp. The playing child soaks the stamp off and her whereabouts is thus learned. This makes a fairly strong offering.

THE NOISE OF BOMBS (Keystone), Nov. 19.—A careless maid, a stolen baby, a policeman, and a lighted bomb are some of the ingredients in this typical number. The situations become laughable and exciting toward the close. Photography good.

LOVE FINDS A WAY (Royal), Nov. 21.—A one-reel nonsense farce with Louis Simon. The situations are astonishing enough to be counted funny. It is hard to gauge the effect of this kind of offering on any audience; for much depends on what kind of spirit comes into the house on any particular evening. This is a picture that might be a "roar" in one place at one time and a rather dull offering in another.

FATTY'S WINE PARTY (Keystone), Nov. 24.—Roscoe and Mabel go to a restaurant. Syd Chaplin, a new Keystone star, is introduced as a waiter and does some amusing stunts. He juggles the food and plates and falls on the kitchen floor in pleasing fashion. The Fat Boy, being unable to pay for the dinner, is stripped of his coat and shirt. This is well photographed and amusing.

BEFORE AND AFTER (Royal), Nov. 28.—A single-reel farcical offering, featuring Louis Simon as Pa. Pa is a nervous wreck before he gets an athlete to give him a little new blood. After—Pa is in high feather and begins to get into trouble while the athlete limps home. The picture gets its fun out of Pa's troubles. The girl he takes to dinner steals his pocket-book and the management makes him work out his bill. It would have been all right if people or his family hadn't come for a bite to the restaurant. A fair offering.

THE MOCCASIN PRINT (Frontier), Nov. 14.—A Western number of about average interest. The jealous girl dresses up as an Indian maid and ties her rival to a tree. The lover appears and shoots at the Indian girl, a tragedy being narrowly averted. This is fairly strong, but not particularly well photographed.

DOT'S ELOPEMENT (Sterling), Nov. 19.—Conventional knock-about comedy, in which the girl is about to marry the real estate agent at her father's request, when her lover falls heir to a fortune. They elope and a chase ensues. This proves moderately amusing.

A RELIC OF OLDEN DAYS (Frontier), Nov. 21.—A Western number, in which an old scout tells the story of the stone hammer. The scenes revert to primitive days, showing love and rivalry in the stone age. The scenes are picturesque and well taken. The story itself is not particularly new, but proves quite entertaining.

TRAFFIC IN BABIES (Rex), Nov. 22.—A comedy number, written by Ruth Ann Baldwin. The girl and her lover become separated and she becomes a park nurse. A little girl steals the baby and turns it over to the hero. In the search for the baby the girl and her lover are reunited. This is pleasingly presented and well photographed.

A FRIEND IN NEED (Eclair), Nov. 22.—A half-reel number in which a little girl, portrayed by Clara Horton, sells a messenger boy's bicycle to get medicine for her sick mother. The policeman befriends the child after her mother's death. This is quite appealing.

OUR BELOVED COUNTRY (Eclair), Nov. 22.—On same reel with above. A novel feature of instructive and ingenious character. All the changes in the map of the United States are shown from the discovery of America down to the present time. An attractive feature.

THE GROOM'S DOOM (L. K. O.), Nov. 22.—A park flirtation followed by a boxing match is the chief amusement in this. The principals all wind up in a mud puddle. Not very strong, the situations having been overworked considerably.

BLACK HANDS (Sterling), Nov. 23.—A small boy with a pot of jam leaves numerous imprints around his father's premises. Skylark Fumes, the celebrated detective, is called and an amusing investigation follows. This idea has been used before, but is here handled fairly well and makes quite a pleasing offering.

AS WE JOURNEY THROUGH LIFE (Nestor), Nov. 24.—This pictures Murdock MacQuarrie looking through an old family album. One by one the pictures take life and scenes are shown from his boyhood up. The manner of presenting this is surprisingly novel and the photography fortunately very good for such small views. The story moves along to a satisfactory climax and the offering proves very enjoyable and unique.

THE TRICKY FLUNKY (Joker), Nov. 25.—Ernest Shields appears in this well-photographed number as Flunky in a restaurant. Unfortunately, the scenes are not of an attractive sort and the situations do not contain much real humor. Even eccentric comedy needs more plot than this.

IN TAXI 23 (Nestor), Nov. 27.—A dashing little comedy number, with Eddie Lyons, Victoria Forde and Lee Moran in the cast. The first two are the lovers and Lee is the "dirty villain." The girl is kidnapped; there is a wild pursuit and final victory for the hero. A good burlesque number.

HE MARRIED HER ANYHOW (Joker), Nov. 28.—A burlesque number with Wm. Franey and Louise Fazenda in the cast. The father objects to the girl's lover, but when the members of the terrible Zebra gang show up the young man finds a way to win father's consent. This contains some amusing spots, the humor being of the slapstick brand.

THE POLICE DOG (Pathe).—An animated cartoon that will surely be acceptable.

A FRIEND OF THE BIRDS (Pathe).—On the same reel as this. Just a bit of showing the technical side of ornithology.

WHIFFLES WINS THE WINSOME (Pathe).—A laughable farce dealing with the trial of lover over the telephone; for the "winsome" is the girl with the beautiful voice. It will go very acceptably.

COLUMBO, CEYLON (Pathe).—A short but well-photographed scenic picture of the capital city of the island kingdom south of the East Indian coast.

Independent Specials

THE LAST CURTAIN CALL (Central Features).—This four-part subject from the Savoia studios has been elaborately staged. There are picturesque backgrounds, among others of the Mediterranean and Monte Carlo. The interiors, especially the theater scenes, are of unusual size. Mlle Helios has the role of Clara Dramy, an opera singer who transfers her none too strong regard from a count to Marquis George d'Ark, finely played by M. Delcolle. With the marquis she falls deeply in love, which is reciprocated, the former ignoring an old-time sweetheart. When the marquis through her extravagance gets into debt she goes to the count for assistance. His price is that she returns to him, which reluctantly she does. The ending is a double tragedy—the death of the old marquis when he learns of his son's misconduct and the suicide of the actress when she is denounced by the younger marquis. The love-making is much in evidence—to some it will be offensively so. The picture is well acted as well as well produced, but it is essentially European in theme and treatment.

THE LINK THAT BINDS (Rex), Nov. 8. After the opening scenes, which will strike the average observer as vague and meaningless, this opens up into an unusually entertaining story. Herbert Rawlinson, Wm. Worthington and Frank Lloyd play the leading male parts and Helen Leslie gives a convincing portrayal of the wronged girl. The story tells how an outraged father forces a young man to do the honorable thing by his daughter. This is splendidly photographed and unusually well acted. A good offering.

THE EMPIRE OF ILLUSION (Victor), Nov. 23.—This two-reel number is the second instalment of the series of adventures featuring J. Warren Kerrigan as a soldier of fortune named Terence O'Rourke. This number has a romantic desert setting, picturing an oasis in the midst of a sandy waste. The story should connect up in some way with the previous episode, showing how O'Rourke sets out to save the brother of the princess. The duel scene, fight with the Moors, capture and rescue of the princess all make good features. The entire second reel contains much interesting action. The series promises to be very interesting.

THE MYSTERIOUS ROSE (Gold Seal), Nov. 24.—Another "My Lady Raffles" two-reel offering, with Grace Cunard and Francis Ford in the leads. The crafty girl crook this time dabbles in political affairs, luring the son of the district attorney to his death. Her gang is rounded up by the detective after a difficult pursuit and there is a wild hand-to-hand conflict toward the close. The girl makes her usual escape through a mysterious passageway. This is well photographed and a good offering of the melodramatic type.

THE HEIRESS AND THE CROOK (Eclair), Nov. 25.—This two-reel offering shows hurried construction, but develops quite an entertaining situation toward the close. The exposure of the fake spiritualistic medium is the chief feature of the story and it is shown how the girl assistant rides up a dumb waiter in the rear room behind the curtains. The girl in the case, portrayed by Mildred Counselman, is saved from the bogus count, with whom the spiritualist is in league, and restored to her lover. With stronger treatment this could have been worked up to better advantage as the story is quite a good one.

HUMAN HEARTS (Imp), Nov. 26.—This three-reel production gives an excellent screen presentation of Hal Reid's famous old melodrama. King Baggot is cast as the young blacksmith and Arline Pretty as the sweetheart. The city adventuress appears on the scene with her male companion; she marries the blacksmith and later tires of life in the country. She induces her former pal to commit murder. He stabs Tom's father by mistake and the false wife flees with him to the city, abandoning her child. Later the child is stolen. Other features are the tramp, the blind mother, the hero's false imprisonment and subsequent pardon. The photography is unusually good throughout and the production makes the most of its subject matter.

HEART OF THE NIGHT WIND (Victor), Nov. 27.—A three-reel story of rival lumber camps at war with one another. Mary Fuller plays the role of the mountain girl and Charles Ogle and Edw. Mortimer have important parts. The mountain girl does a number of unusual things which give charm to the scenes—climbing rocks, wading streams and conversing with her Indian friends. Some of the photographic effects are very artistic. The love story is complicated by the arrival of the girl novelist who tries vainly to take Mary's lover from her. In the war between the camps a raft is blown up with dynamite and two of the tough members fall from a high cliff. This is well pictured and holds the interest.

THE BRAND OF HIS TRIBE (Bison), Nov. 28.—An unusually good example of the Western Indian two-reel drama. This is full of action and tells a connected story. The soldier, Wilcox, befriends an Indian girl, who saves his life after the outbreak of hostilities. The night attack is splendidly photographed, the scenes being actually taken at night and the spirited fighting revealed only by firelight. Later the child of Wilcox and the Indian girl grows to manhood and returns to the white people. He is refused permission to marry the colonel's daughter until both go to the Indian tribe under exciting circumstances. This is a successful revival of the familiar Western film in which Indian fighting is the leading feature.

THE ODALISQUE (Majestic), Nov. 15.—A two-reel story featuring Blanche Sweet as a young girl who is a slave to dress. Wallace Reid is the villain who attempts to turn her from the straight path, and Henry Walthal is the hero. The story is above the average in interest and presentation. It brings home a good moral and carries a strong warning to girls who are susceptible to the lure of wine suppers and fine clothes given them by designing men. Though delicate in theme, this is finely handled. It is adapted from a short story by Leroy Scott. Joe's rescue was exciting and well staged. A good offering.

REDBIRD WINS (American), Nov. 16.—A two-reel race-horse melodrama set in old Tennessee and an offering that is sure to please the many. Colonel Dinwidy had gambled once too often, but he and his daughter still have Redbird and as usual in this kind of story the racer puts the family back on its feet. The picture has good atmosphere—the girl is Vivian Rich, the colonel is Harry Von Meter, the true lover is William Garwood and the villain is Jack Richardson. Besides, there is good help from the lesser characters, especially from Louise Lester, as an old darkie mammy, and from Perry Banks, as darkie butler. At the end the girl rides the horse to victory in spite of all the villain can do with dope for the horse and rum for the jockey. There are good race scenes included. The staging and photography show up-to-date skill and quality.

PAWNS OF FATE (Thanhouser), Nov. 17.—A two-reel story written by Philip Lonergan. The first reel contains a number of rather meaningless scenes, but the second comes up well with some stirring situations. The governor's twin daughters are kidnapped by a criminal gang, because he will not pardon one of their number. The lovers between them manage to bring about their release after considerable exciting detective work on both the part of the girl and the young man. The suspense is well maintained throughout the entire second reel.

NIPPED (Domino), Nov. 19).—A two-reel story of a fishing village off Mexico, with warfare between Japs and Americans as the theme. Tsuri Oaki and other Japanese performers appear. The story begins with Tom, an American artist, painting pictures of the Jap girl. Some striking coast scenes are here pictured. Later Tom, who is also an American spy, learns that a ship loaded with ammunition is coming. He leads an expedition to blow up the Japanese mission. The girl goes to his tent to warn him of danger and is shot through the canvas by her own people unwittingly. The action in this number is very good and the story itself is quite strong. The photography is good.

IN THE CANDLELIGHT (American), Nov. 23.—A two-reel story written by Marc Edmund Jones, with Wm. Garwood, Vivian Rich, Charlotte Burton and other capable performers in the cast. In the opening scenes a husband takes his little girl and leaves his wife, thinking she is in love with an artist named Bertram. In later years, after the mother's death, the girl develops artistic instincts and applies to Bertram for instructions. Her father learns of Bertram's whereabouts and attempts to kill him, but is prevented in this. He then learns that his wife had never been untrue to him. The story carries the interest in a pleasing way; it has the advantage of good photography and a good cast.

THE SEA NYMPHS (Keystone), Nov. 24.—A two-reel number with the Fat Boy and Mabel in the cast. Their flirtation starts on a boat heading for Catalina and is continued, with startling interruptions, on that island resort. The various characters visit the bath houses and their troubles continue. Ambrose, a chance acquaintance, is locked in a room with one of the women, and Mabel dons a bathing suit and does some high diving. She also feeds the sea lions. Two reels of entertaining nonsense without very much p ot, but containing some pleasing resort views.

THE CROSS IN THE DESERT (Broncho), Nov. 25.—A two-reel number in which the superintendent of a railroad makes drastic rules against hoboes. The poor clerk, traveling as a tramp, is thrown off a freight train and killed. Big Jim, leader of the hoboes, captures the superintendent and takes his place. The superintendent dies on the desert over the clerk's grave. This is splendidly put on and has a new plot, though it makes a plea for a shiftless type of humanity. The observer naturally wonders if hoboes are really cast bodily off moving trains, or whether this is merely a piece of imagination. The photography is good.

A CROOK'S SWEETHEART (Kay-Bee), Nov. 27.—A two-reel number dealing with the love affairs of four crooks, two men and two women. The story is well constructed throughout and presented with spirit. It pictures a low type of life and has no very elevating motive, except that The Dip and Flora are supposed to reform at the last and live a straight life. The story is engrossing in spite of its somewhat sordid character and holds the interest without break. The photography is good.

THE MILLS OF THE GODS (Domino), Nov. 26.—A very entertaining two reel number by Ince and Spencer. This is a Dutch story, with appropriate settings and fine characterizations. The story itself is unusually good and concerns an old miser and his family. He allows his wife to die of neglect and turns his little girl over to a neighboring family to bring up. Later the girl falls in love with the neighbor's son and refuses to return home. The miser is killed by his son, in the old mill. The settings in this are new and pleasing and some fine pastoral scenes are shown. It is novel and sure to please.

THE TOREADOR'S OATH (Pathe).—A three-reel offering of distinction and merit. It gives a passionate love story, artistically acted, among the lovely scenes of the famous city of Seville in Spain. The love affair of two bull fighters and the pretty fruit seller with the oath that she and one of them swore at the way-side shrine makes a story that holds from the very first till its close. Some of it transpires during a bull fight and these scenes show a real bull fight, but with nothing that can possibly offend. It is dramatic and exciting to a degree—a picture that will go well.

THE MASTER KEY (Universal Special Release), Nov. 23.—In this second two-reel episode the observer gets acquainted with Robert Leonard in the part of John Dore, a young mining engineer. The part fits him very well. He falls in love with Gallon's daughter, the scenes being at "The Master Key" mine. Ella Hall makes this part an attractive one. Wilkinson appears to Gallon, who has been haunted by visions of the former partner he thought he had killed. Wilkinson and his friend, Mrs. Darnell, promise to start a conspiracy to gain the mine. The scene toward the close, where John rescues Ruth from the speeding runaway car, was daring and full of spirit. The mine setting is picturesque.

Helen Leslie

FOUR months ago the name of Helen Leslie was enrolled on the extra roster of the Universal West Coast studios. "Experience, none" was written after it and there the attention of the employment office ended. Not so the directors, however. They saw the quiet, unobtrusive little, brown-haired, brown-eyed girl of scarcely eighteen years and recognized in her an absolute type, a perfect juvenile. She was given small parts and instructed in the use of grease paints by other actresses about the studio (for where will you find people so willing to help inexperience as among actor folk?) and she made her debut.

Helen Leslie.

Gradually her parts became more important and still she did them well. At last, three months after her coming to the Universal, she was cast for her first lead, the part of Jessie Guthrie in "A Soul's Awakening," produced by Frank Lloyd during the absence of Otis Turner on his vacation. So willing was the little girl to learn all that anyone could teach her, so ready was she to listen to the words of those whose experience gave them the right to explain to her, that before the last scene had been taken, she was recognized as one who was not only bound to rise in the game, but one with whom it was a pleasure to work. Then with the organizing of the new Rex company, to be put under Frank Lloyd's direction, she was cast for the position of juvenile lead. The names of the remainder of the regular cast may shed some light on the importance of her new place, for with her are to play George Larkin, of "Trey O' Hearts" fame, Frank Lloyd, himself, whose work with Mr. Turner has made him known wherever Universal pictures are shown, and Marc Robbins, for long, one of the best character portrayers with the Kerrigan-Victor company. All of these people are masters in their profession, and have been for years in the game. Miss Leslie has been at it less than four months. You may draw your own inferences.

Miss Leslie was born eighteen years ago in Indianapolis. After a thorough schooling in Notre Dame, she and her father and mother (there are no brothers nor sisters), came to California, where she very naturally dropped into the niche that she was best fitted to fill.

NEPTUNE'S DAUGHTER CAPTURES CANADA.

Neptune's Daughter, the big Universal feature, has captured Canada. Opening last week at the Princess, Toronto, for one week the business has been so satisfactory that the second week was immediately booked, and is continuing with increased receipts.

In Montreal the same film was presented Monday at His Majesty's Theater and business was so good that the second week was booked.

In Ottawa, at the Russel Theater, the Governor-General, the Dominion household and members of Parliament, which is now in session, attended the opening performance. The business is excellent. L. N. Scott, manager of the theaters in St. Paul and Minneapolis, who booked "Neptune's Daughter" originally for one week, has booked it again for presentation within the current month, so good has been the business

The Motion Picture Exhibitor

LEAGUE ACTIVITIES.

President Pearce's Letter to the Manufacturers—Big Meeting at Harrisburg Which Will Take Place in January.

MARION S. PEARCE, the president of The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, has recently sent out a letter to all the prominent manufacturers in this country asking their cooperation in the arrangements for the next annual convention and exposition. In the text of his letter Mr. Pearce calls attention to the splendid work done by the league at Washington in connection with the reduction of the war tax. He says that the league fought the proposition made to them by the Special Finance Committee to impose a tax on the films as they left the producer's plant. As a result of their fight the proposed tax on manufacturers was abandoned.

"The National League," the letter continues, "will very shortly hold an executive meeting at which one of the important matters will be the choice of the city for the next annual convention and exposition. We want to select a city that will meet the approval of the exhibitors and at the same time prove agreeable to the manufacturers. We realize fully that in some instances in the past the manufacturers have had honest and just cause for complaint. We're going to avoid all this at our next convention and exhibition. We're going to conduct it along business lines; so it will be a pleasure to every manufacturer to have an exhibit included, and so he will realize some real, business benefit from the expense this exhibit has cost him, and make this benefit so large that he'll be glad to have participated in it.

"The convention will be so conducted that it will be a real help; it will be a real budget of helpful information in handy form, and the incidents and various portions of the features of such a nature that an exhibitor may return to his home with valuable information which he can turn into profits in his own business.

"Not the least feature will be the assurance of your having ample time to place your products before him and get in touch with him in a way that is sure to impress him, and bring results to you.

"The league is growing! It's growing healthily! Frictions and factions are being eliminated, and amalgamation is going on apace.

"We've had many suggestions as to the city for the next convention and exposition. Some favor San Francisco, on account of the Pan-American Exposition, feeling that thousands would like to attend the two. Others feel that New York City is the logical place, being the headquarters of the motion picture industry. Still others seem inclined toward Chicago and Philadelphia, in view of the fact that New York has been the scene of several previous conventions.

"We'd appreciate your views and your preference in this connection. I'd thank you for an expression as to which city you think best, and assure you that your choice will have weight enough to assist us greatly in locating the next convention."

Mr. Pearce told a representative of The Moving Picture World who visited the league headquarters at Baltimore last week that the responses to his letter had been most gratifying and were coming in every day. All the replies emphasize the willingness of the manufacturer to co-operate with the exhibitor in all matters of mutual welfare and interest. Mr. Pearce said that the New York situation was beginning to show signs of clearing up and that amalgamation was being accomplished in all the states where there had been two camps. Mr. Pearce has received an urgent invitation to attend the meeting which will be held in the early part of January at Harrisburg, Pa. Arrangements are being made for a monster meeting at which it is hoped every county in the Keystone state will be represented. A strong and united organization will be the result of the Harrisburg convention.

Both the eastern and western sections of the state will be largely represented. Mr. Wheeler, the president of the state organization, says that a vigorous campaign against legalized censorship will be prosecuted as soon as the state legislature meets.

EXHIBITORS MUST MAKE RETURNS.

Internal Revenue Collector Issues Tax Return Blanks for Picture Theaters—Penalty for Failure to Report.

THEATER owners and others subject to a special tax under the tax provision of the act to increase the internal revenue, passed by Congress on October 22, must make returns during the present month or be subject to a penalty of 50 per cent. in addition to the tax, and a warning to this effect has been issued by the internal revenue bureau.

Blank forms on which returns are to be made will be supplied by the proper authorities in the various districts. In the event of the inability of an exhibitor to obtain the necessary form, a statement, or return of liability, may be made on plain paper, which can be received as a tentative return, relieving the exhibitor from any liability to the 50 per cent. penalty for delinquency.

The following rulings have been made under the special-tax provisions of the war revenue act of June 13, 1898, and its amendments, which were identical with, or essentially similar to, the special-tax provisions of the Act of October 22, 1914, and while not necessarily controlling, they will be given great weight in construing the requirements of the later act, as Congress, in practically re-enacting the provisions of the earlier act, must be considered to have done so in the light of the administrative construction given to that act.

Sixth provision: "Proprietors of theaters, museums, and concert halls, where a charge for admission is made, having a seating capacity of not more than two hundred and fifty, shall pay $25; having a seating capacity of more than two hundred and fifty and not exceeding five hundred, shall pay $50; having a seating capacity exceeding five hundred and not exceeding eight hundred shall pay $75; having a seating capacity of more than eight hundred shall pay $100.

"Persons are not required to pay special taxes for the mere occasional renting of their hall for public performances to dramatic companies or other persons charging entrance money therefor, but the special tax of $10 is required to be paid by such persons or companies if they give dramatic performances or the other exhibitions specially mentioned in paragaph 8, section 2.

"Where theaters are entirely closed to performances during the months of July and August, and only open in the month of September, the special tax is to be reckoned from the first day of September to the first day of July following, at the rate of $100 for the year begininng July 1.

"Moving picture shows taxable as theaters under section 6.

"A special-tax stamp taken out by the lessees of a theater can not, upon their transferring their lease to other persons, be transferred and made to answer for the latter persons in conducting the theater."

"BEATING BACK" EXHIBITED AFTER DISPUTE.

When the Thanhouser Company brought the Al. Jennings pictures, "Beating Back," to Kansas City, Mo., they were informed that the pictures would have to be shown to the board of censorship before they could be exhibited publicly. The consequence was that the films were rejected both by the censors and by the board of appeals, to which they were later referred. Immediately the Thanhouser representatives secured a restraining order permitting them to show the films. However, by this time the afternoon matinee which had been advertised, was given up. That evening the appeal board met again, and at this meeting it was decided that the pictures were not as bad as the appeal board thought they were when it passed upon them in the morning.

The pictures had a very successful run in Kansas City, and after finishing four days in the Convention Hall were booked for four days in the Maze Theater. At Convention Hall Al. Jennings gave a short speech before each performance, and explained the pictures as they were shown.

In regard to the action taken by the censors in Kansas City, Mr. Jennings said: "I have been living an upright life for the last twelve years, and I could not or would not allow anything to be shown on the moving picture screen that would have any immoral influence whatever because it would immediately reflect upon me, and situated as I am at the present time this would be very undesirable, if not dangerous."

War Pictures Barred in Ontario

Decision of Ontario Censor Board May Spread Throughout Canada—Claims Pictures Are Detrimental to Enlisting.

FOLLOWING a presentment on the part of the Grand Jury of the High Court of Ontario, handed to Judge Coatsworth in Toronto recently, the Ontario Board of Moving Picture Censors has made an "ironclad" ruling that no picture showing the gruesome side of battle will be permitted in any of the moving picture theaters of Ontario. Not only will these pictures come under the hammer of the censors, but many war dramas which have already passed the censors will be recalled and relegated to the scrap heap.

The far-reaching importance of this decision, which will probably spread to the entire Dominion of Canada, may be intimated from the censoring of "The Boer War," a five-part story, and the new version of the "Battle of Waterloo," which story has been shown in most of the theaters of Ontario for the last few months.

"Before the war broke out many pictures were shown which helped to stir the patriotic feeling of the young people," says George E. Armstrong, chairman of the board, 'but the pictures being shown now in the opinion of the censors have quite the reverse effect. With women, particularly, it is contended, that seeing men falling on a field of battle will raise their feelings to such an extent that the necessary consent of a wife to allow her husband to go to the front, or of a mother her son, will not be obtainable. It is claimed that many of the pictures have had a detrimental effect on the rate of enlisting."

The two-reel new version of the "Battle of Waterloo," submitted to the board, was censored because it showed British troops fighting against French troops, and the present enemies of Great Britain fighting by her side in the trenches. How many more films will be killed on account of this ruling is now anxiously awaited, but two feature films on the first day offered a pretty gloomy aspect for the exhibitors and exchanges who have brought some of the pictures to Canada at great expense.

FRISCO'S FILM BOARD ADOPTS RESOLUTIONS.

The Film Exchange Board of Trade of San Francisco has adopted resolutions which specify that on and after November 16 the free distribution of posters and advertising matter will be discontinued. It has also ruled that exhibitors who are being supplied with from three to seven changes of features each week, or who are taking a regular film service, must give one week's notice before discontinuing service. All exhibitors in San Francisco, Oakland, Alameda, and other suburban cities are being advised that bills for service must be paid promptly and that when accounts are not settled by the close of business on the Monday following any week no more credit will be extended, but that cash must be paid in advance for each reel taken out. Exhibitors generally realize that indiscriminate credit in the past has been more to their disadvantage than otherwise, and express satisfaction that the business is being placed on a more stable basis.

NEW YORK EXHIBITORS BALL.

This is the season of entertainments and balls and the motion picture people are contributing their share of the festivities. The Screen Club ball at the Astor Hotel on Thanksgiving eve is to be followed closely by the annual ball of the New York Exhibitors' Association, to be held on the evening of December 7 at the Grand Central Palace, Lexington avenue, New York. President Landau and a corps of active committeemen are industriously preparing for this event. Many interesting entertainment features have been booked and a large number of picture players will be present. It is also proposed to operate four picture theaters in connection with the ball, in which the latest releases will be shown for the first time.

ORDINANCE PROHIBITS EXHIBITION OF WAR FILMS.

The Board of Supervisors of San Francisco, Cal., has passed the ordinance prohibiting the showing of war films at moving picture theaters, but this is not to go into effect for thirty days. It is understood that its constitutionality will be tested as soon as an effort is made to enforce it.

Screen Club of Pittsburgh Formed

Meeting Held at Fort Pitt Hotel Results in Organization of Permanent Social Body.

More than three hundred persons identified with the motion picture business met at the Fort Pitt Hotel, Pittsburgh, Sunday, November 15, for the purpose of forming a permanent social organization. A. Dresner, manager of Warner's Features, Inc., 406 Ferry street, explained the purpose of the call, after which Max W. Herring was put in charge of the program. He said the dinner that was to follow had been provided by the manufacturers and dealers in motion pictures and then called upon Joseph N. Mackrell, of the "Pittsburgh Chronicle Telegraph," who spoke on "The Power of the Screen." Following Representative A. C. Stein made an address on the "Necessity of Organizing," and his speech imbued everyone present with the spirit of organization. Peter Antonoplas, owner of the Olympic theater, Fifth avenue, Pittsburgh, then followed with a talk in behalf of the exhibitors and their hardships. H. B. Miller advocated the abolishment of the censorship. Addresses were also made by the following: Leo Levison, A. Klein, Mr. Rittenhouse, Peter Demas, N. Silverman and H. B. Kester. H. C. Kliehm, owner of the Lawrence theater, spoke in behalf of the Harrisburg convention in January.

At five o'clock a banquet was served at which everyone enjoyed himself. Following this feast Sydney E. Abel, manager of the Continental Feature Film Company, 420 Penn avenue, presided and proceeded with the work of organization. H. B. Kester, owner of the Cameraphone theater, East Liberty, Pittsburgh, was elected president; A. S. Dresner, manager of Warner's Features, vice-president; William S. Mayer, editor of "The Pittsburgh Bulletin," secretary; Leo F. Levison, manager of the World Film Corporation, corresponding secretary, and A. J. Hanna, secretary of the Exhibitor's League, treasurer. The board of governors is composed of A. Klein, manager of the Keno Feature Film Company; Harvey B. Day, manager of the Box Office Attractions Company; Sydney E. Abel, manager of the Continental Feature Film Company; H. B. Miller, manager of the Pittsburgh Photoplay Company, and Peter Antonopolas, owner of the Olympic theater. Max W. Herring was unanimously elected official organizer and Messrs. Mackrell and Stein were unanimously elected honorary members.

Many people have had the impression that the purpose of the organization has designs along political lines, although everyone connected is strong in condemning any such idea. The purpose of the organization is strictly social. The welfare of every one connected with the motion picture industry for the betterment of conditions, the furtherance of a kindly feeling and an intermingling of common ideas and purposes for the betterment of local conditions are the sole objects.

Suitable club quarters will immediately be obtained and plans are being made for a social gathering at least once a month to bring about more harmony in the motion picture industry.

"THE ORDEAL" BANNED IN NEW YORK.

Justice Davis, in Supreme Court, Upholds Decision of Commissioner of Licenses.

In the case of the Life Photofilm Company against George H. Bell, Commissioner of Licenses in this city, in which an injunction had been asked against the commission to restrain him from interfering with the exhibition of the photoplay "The Ordeal," Justice Davis at Special Term Supreme Court has rendered a decision against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant. The injunction prayed for by Rogers & Rogers, attorneys for the Life Photoplay Company, is denied and the position of the commissioner amply sustained. The decision reads as follows:

"Motion is denied. The Commissioner of Licenses has exercised a wise discretion considering the character of the picture shown and a Court of Equity will not interfere with his action."

BOOMING THE BOSTON BALL.

President Horstman of the Boston Exhibitors' League and his right-hand man, S. Grant, were in New York for several days last week working up interest among the picturemen in the ball to be given by the Boston Exhibitors on the evening of Wednesday, December 2. One of the features of this event will be a series of dancing contests for loving cups. A large attendance is anticipated and the biggest auditorium in Boston has been secured for the occasion. A special train will leave New York to convey a delegation of picture men to Beantown.

"The Master of the House"

Two-Reel Domino That Is Sure to Please Married Men.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

BEFORE and after I saw "The Master of the House" several men commented favorably upon it. "Strong play," "corking good story," etc., but every one of those men had a wife, and its punch was all in their favor. It is a character comedy, admirably acted, and conveys a moral which every married woman should study on the same general principle that she laughs at her husband's moth-eaten jokes. She should be brought to appreciate the fact that man is lord and master in the household, however puny he may really be everywhere except in his own self-estimate. Some man who is not master of the house wrote this play just as he ordinarily cusses his wife under his breath and wishes to God he had never met her. The play was written for spite, but it is high time something was done to check the invasion of man's rights. The way women folks are carrying on these days is something awful.

Guy Winston is a roughneck from the noble West, whose principal achievement is that of stumbling upon a rich vein of ore. He visits the effete East to get some of its tainted money and happens into the Herrington family—mother, son and daughter. The Herringtons have not stumbled on a vein of gold; to the contrary, they have suffered reverses and cannot reconcile tastes and habits of an opulent lifetime with their depleted revenues. So they plan to marry Lois to the owner of the Croesus Mines. Man-like, he thinks they want him, not his possessions, and he becomes sore after wedding Lois to find out that they regard him much as he does the vein of gold, merely as a lucky find. This proves a blow to his vanity—it never having occurred to him that a wife must be won and not bought if her love is desired.

He does not plan to win his wife by natural roads to her yielding affections, but prepares a solitary feast and purchases a costly necklace to be sprung on her "in honor of her birthday," although she has an engagement to go to the theater with her parasitic mother and brother. She is dressed to enjoy an evening's entertainment such as she has been accustomed to most of her life, when the husband drags her into the library and asserts that she must pass the evening reading aloud to him. She resents his corn-beef-and-cabbage manners, but is forced to yield, and he ties her to a chair with the bell rope. He now tries the third degree torture and she stands out against such methods with determined courage.

In pursuance of his rule of force, that now on trial in Europe, the husband licks the stuffing out of her brother and throws him out of the library, to condole with the mother. Husband proposes to show wifey who is master of the house. All night long she sits tied to the chair, resisting the enemy with Belgian pluck, until hunger overcomes her. When he tortures her by eating his breakfast in her presence, nature asserts herself, and the wife gives up. She even consents to go west with the masterful man and live in a house for two. Such is the end of a play destined to please all married men, particularly those who wish they were not, but we are given no glimpses of what wifey does to her lord and master when she gets him alone in that house for two. The tender side of woman is so easily reached that "The Master of the House" becomes a delightful character comedy to the connoisseur.

"The Man Who Could Not Lose"

Richard Harding Davis' Story Filmed in Five Reels by Carlyle Blackwell for Favorite Players Company.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

IF every man who has wished that he could not lose sees this picture in a theater it is certain of a great financial success. Its hero dreams the names of horses who always win; he simply cannot lose. This is, by the way, a wonderfully clever melodramatic means of making the hero of a story win out and at the same time ruin the villain, who in this picture is a fraudulent bookmaker at the track. The hero wins a drygoods box of money from him.

The story has been filmed clearly. It is not, in its detail, wholly fresh; but it keeps a thread of narrative continually moving. The sets and backgrounds are most praiseworthy; in many cases the scenes are beautiful. Its hero is a writer of stories who is poor. He is the accepted lover of the daughter of a rich man who tries to force her—no reason is given—to marry a poverty-stricken count being financed by a bookmaker. This man, the villain, wants the count to persuade the rich man to bet on horses and is willing that the count should marry the rich man's daughter. The girl's father at once accepts him for what he is worth as a count and arranges a match with the daughter.

The rich man's second daughter is loved by the minister—a character who is introduced to furnish fun, and is a weak spot in the picture. This minister and the other daughter help the primary romance when the father, because he has seen the novelist standing outside of a cheap restaurant, refuses to let him call any more. The climax, showing how the hero, after a romantic elopement, wins all the money that the bookmaker has got from the rich father and others and how the count falls to serving in a restaurant, has the excitement of the race with horses coming in neck to neck and has a good measure of humor.

AMERICANS MAY FIND MARKET IN ITALY.

On account of the European war film men in Italy are no longer able to obtain their customary supply of motion pictures and trade accessories from England, France and Germany, writes Aldo P. Zucchi, of 23 Viale Bianca Maria, Milan, Italy, to the Moving Picture World. Mr. Zucchi says he would like to get in communication with several of the important American film and material manufacturers. He adds that he believes the present to be an excellent time for American manufacturers to get in touch with film men in Italy, with the possibility of finding in that country a very profitable market.

STATISTICS SHOW PICTURE INDUSTRY FAVORED.

The recent publication of statistics showing that the moving picture industry is the fourth in the United States brings a flood of complaints at different conventions. Missionary bodies lament that more is spent for picture shows than for gospel work, temperance workers make similar depreciating comparisons, and just recently a good roads association complained because more money went for photoplays than for the making of good highways. The Bloomington, Ill., Bulletin takes exception to this contrast and insists that the moving picture show should be viewed as an educator as well as an entertainer for the masses, and not as a luxury.

Bennett Becomes Exhibitor

Well-Known Theatrical Press Agent Buys Half Interest in Burland Theaters and Joins David Picker.

DAVID V. PICKER and H. Whitman Bennett announce that they have joined forces for the purpose of founding an extensive circuit of large theaters. The alliance has been brought about through the sale of Mr. Picker to Mr. Bennett of a half interest in the control of the Burland and Eighth Avenue Theaters.

Mr. Picker, who has long been widely known in mercantile circles, assumed the lease of the Burland Theater at 985 Prospect avenue, Bronx, even before the erection of the house, and was indeed responsible for the building of a theater of such unusual proportions. He assumed direct personal management in June of the current year, and since that time the Burland has become the admitted center of Bronx motion picture events. The Burland is a modern and absolutely fireproof building, and has the largest seating capacity of any playhouse in the Bronx, in addition to an immense "open air" for warm weather use. It is here that Cabiria was recently presented for a number of consecutive days to record-breaking business for uptown New York.

The Eighth Avenue Theater was formerly known as Miner's Eighth Avenue. As in the case of the Burland, it is now devoted to the very best motion pictures obtainable. It has recently been remodeled and all obstructions removed from the auditorium.

Though a positive announcement would be premature at the moment, Messrs. Picker and Bennett expect soon to have a theater on Broadway, where they will establish central offices for the circuit, which is also to include houses in Brooklyn and nearby cities. Mr. Picker will remain in personal executive charge of both houses for himself and Mr. Bennett.

Mr. Bennett is well known as a newspaper man and press agent, and was for several seasons general press representative with the Messrs. Shubert. He severed his last previous connection, with the Mutual Film Corporation, to become press representative for the Jesse Lasky Feature Play Co. and to enter into his new affiliation with Mr. Picker.

British Notes

APROPOS to my reference last week to the new emergency regulations respecting the storage and distribution of film it is now possible to cite the exact wording of the Government order: "No persons shall in any prescribed area have in his possession or in premises occupied by him any cinematograph film exceeding 6,000 feet unless he has obtained the prescribed permit and observes all the prescribed requirements." Another clause enacts: "Any police constable or any person authorized in writing by the chief of police may enter (if need be by force) and search any premises in which he has reasonable cause to believe that celluloid or cinematograph film is kept or stored, and, if the prescribed permit has not been obtained, or if any of the prescribed requirements be not complied with may remove and destroy any such celluloid or film."

A new producing venture—The British Film Company—has got to work during the past few days upon a number of war subjects. The company has acquired a very attractive estate within easy distance of London where they have erected a modern studio and producing plant.

An unusual case was recently heard in the King's Bench in which two film actresses (Miss May Boothroy and Miss Lillie Allen) sued the "Daily Sketch" for libel. The two photoplayers recently appeared as dancers in a film, supposed to represent the interior of a night-club, and the costumes they wore were apparently suited to the scene. A few days afterward the "Daily Sketch" reproduced five pictures from the film purporting them to be actual photographs of early morning incidents in a London night-club. In view of the reputation of such resorts the two players bitterly resent the allegation and are consequently claiming damages for defamation of character.

I had a conversation this week with a theatrical manager from Glasgow who has just managed to return from Germany via New York. He was on vacation in the Hartz Mountains when war was declared, but, traveling about from one town to another, he luckily escaped the attention of the military authorities. In towns such as Cologne, Leipzig and Bremen few moving picture shows or theaters remained open in the early stages of the war, owing to the staffs, including the managers themselves, being called up for service. In the former town the management of a leading show was given over entirely to women. The exhibitions in Berlin continued as usual after war was declared, and although English films were strictly taboo there was no falling (according to the announcements) of American and Danish subjects. The activities of the Deutsche Bioscope Co., which previous to the war were being developed on an ambitious scale, have been considerably curtailed, states my informant, and also two German trade journals suspended publication.

The Society of Authors has not been long in realizing the importance of scenario and moving-picture work as a district branch of the literary art. At a recent meeting, a special kinematograph sub-committee was formed, the elected members being Max Pemberton, Dr. M. C. Stopes, E. H. Leon Watson, Robt. Aitken, L. Benjamin, R. C. Carton, Basil Dean, Mr. P. Dearmer, J. B. Fagan, John Pollock, W. L. George and Edgar Jepson.

EXCHANGE BUILDING FIRE.

Blaze Starts on Sixth Floor of Forty-Fifth Street Picture Center and Causes Some Loss.

SCORES of film men were driven from their happy homes in the Exchange Building, in West Forty-fifth street, New York City, early Thursday afternoon, November 19th, when fire and moving picture film came into contact with the inevitable result.

The blaze was discovered in the offices of the American & European Film Co., W. G. Delamater, manager, on the sixth floor. What caused it had not been discovered when the Moving Picture World went to press. Max Martin, a boy employed in the offices of the Peerless Film Co., on the seventh floor, is said to have turned in the alarm and to have rendered yeoman service in preventing the fire's spreading a great deal more than it did. For his pains and enthusiasm he was the only one injured at the blaze; by accident he thrust his arm through a glass partition and had to be attended by a physician.

S. S. Patterson, manager of the adjoining Hotel St. James, was of great assistance to the firemen who responded to the alarm. It was over ladders which he placed from the hotel to the burning building that fully 250 girls employed in the various offices above the sixth floor were escorted to safety, providing a touch of the spectacular.

PEACE SOCIETY SEES "LAY DOWN YOUR ARMS."

The New York Peace Society gathered in the eighth floor banquet hall of the Hotel Astor on Tuesday afternoon to witness a presentation of the great peace drama, "Lay Down Your Arms," produced by the Great Northern Film Company. The arrangements were made through N. Machat, who has the New York state rights on Great Northern productions. Oscar S. Strauss presided at the meeting. Dr. David Starr Jordan, Chancellor of Leland Stanford Junior University, addressed the assemblage that filled to capacity the great hall, speaking on "The World War."

A GOOD BALBOA ADVERTISEMENT.

The Moving Picture World has received a small felt banner of neat design calculated to give some considerable publicity to the Balboa Amusement Producing Company, makers of the "pictures beautiful." The Horkheimers—H. M. and E. D., proprietors of Balboa, promise some big things that are to break at a very early date. In the meantime, if you have received a Balboa banner, hang it up and look out for further announcements.

WILLIAM GARWOOD WITH UNIVERSAL.

William Garwood is back in New York for the first time in a long while. When Mr. Garwood left New York he was with Thanhouser, later going with the American Film Manufacturing Company at its Santa Barbara studios. With this company he has been eight months, but for some time he has been longing to get back to New York. He will immediately take up leading work for the Universal company, under the direction of Lucius Henderson, at the Imp studio until the completion of the big Fort Lee plant. Mr. Garwood was for two years under the direction of Mr. Henderson in the Thanhouser company. Playing opposite the new Universal leading man will be Violet Mersereau. Mr. Garwood has signed a two-year contract.

WITH the realism of a true motion-picture story, a picturing of life as it is, "The Odalisque" has genuine merit of its own strongly enforced by a cast of exceptional quality. A handful of star performers gives this presentation with admirable skill—it is a flawless performance—and interest is held tight by an insistence on fidelity of atmosphere and detail. The people of the play dress and act as people do under such circumstances, without the slightest concession to dramatic form or license. There is compulsion in naturalness of character and incident that is of higher value than theatrical intensity, though the human document is not by any means complete in its construction. We are bound to feel interested in social conditions that exist, but they must stir profound depths of emotion to rank among the best photostories.

An "Odalisque" is the female slave in Turkish harems, and the application is that of woman's enslavement to her desire to create an impression. It is too often a question of appearances with her, so much so that cynics deny her a conscience—her avoidance of sin resulting from dread of being found out. The character portrayed by Blanche Sweet is hardly that of an odalisque in even a figurative sense, for the girl has a conscience in constant struggle for assertion, though badly complicated with an inordinate desire to appear well. That desire becomes inordinate when the girl consents to wear clothes paid for by an admirer who is not of the marrying kind. He is admirably impersonated by Mr. Curtiss, is an influential buyer in a fashionable millinery store where Blanche is employed. He constantly works on the girl's vanity for purposes of his own and leads her to the danger point of secret interviews and champagne suppers.

There is a real lover, Walthall, whose humble circumstances do not permit extravagant gifts and entertainments. There is also, by way of contrast, a simple couple, portrayed by Miriam Cooper and Robert Harron, who follow the course intended by nature and marry on next-to-nothing a year, just as many of our ancestors did, else many of us would not be here to tell about it. The example of this young couple acts powerfully upon Blanche, but she vacillates between villainous Curtiss and modest Walthall until the latter is driven to drink.

His fall comes near being coincident with her own, yet it is the means of saving both. It brings him to a house maintained by an unscrupulous dressmaker at the moment Blanche is caught in the web and unable to escape alone. The real manhood of Walthall rises out of his weakness, when it becomes evident that the girl he loves is in peril, and he puts up a smashing fight for her rescue, with happy results in the end. Although characterization has scarcely been attempted, all five of the capable performers create distinct individualities and thereby raise the story to a point where it will prove satisfying to any audience.

"When Fate Leads Trump."

Excelsior's Four-Part Subject Has Strong Story Produced Amid Picturesque Mountain Backgrounds.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

IN "When Fate Leads Trump," from the book of Alice M. Roberts, the Excelsior Company has given us a strong picture. Fortifying the dramatic qualities are the unusual backgrounds which Producer Harry Handworth has chosen for the setting of his story. Adirondack scenery abounds; and it is shown in notable photography. There are views of the famous Ausable Chasm, with its walls of terraced rock; there are cascades and waterfalls and rapid mountain streams; there are lumber camps, with their primitive log dwellings and sturdy workers; and there are picturesque villas and palatial hotels.

We may readily forgive the author for making use of the expedient of a mind that is blank as to what has gone before a given occurrence—the sequel precipitates such stirring and moving happenings. The illusion is heightened by the capability of the actors to fit into their characters. The leads are well played by Octavia Handworth and Gordon De Maine. There are three other players that stand out. They are Tom Tempest, Mr. Handworth and William A. Williams. Miss Handworth has the role of Marion, daughter of a retired merchant, who marries Gordon, son of a smuggler; the young man as he fell in love broke away from his father's control. Mr. De Maine plays the son. It is when his wife insists on going with him to visit the sick father that she is kidnapped and the son kept a prisoner; we are not shown what happened to the infant. When revenue officers descend on the camp the men are taken prisoners. The wife, unable after her escape to find her husband, wanders through the fields and over hedges and across streams until exhausted and demented. Then it is she is cared for at the lumber camp, later marrying the paymaster, portrayed by Mr. Tempest.

The climax comes when Gordon, released from prison, finds his wife married to another. It does not strain the credulity when we see the gradual recognition of the first husband. The working out of the problem—and problem it is, for sympathy between the men is equally divided—is most skillfully handled. The duel that follows the appearance of the paymaster is fought with empty cartridges on the part of the man who is legally the husband. It is another way of exemplifying "greater love than this hath no man." It is a sombre finish, but it is worth while.

VITAGRAPHERS VISIT JAMES LACKAYE.

On Friday evening sixty members of the Vitagraph company visited in a body James Lackaye, their former associate, now playing in "The High Cost of Loving" at the Thirty-ninth Street Theater with Lew Fields. All of the company's stars were in the party, and they gave the popular former Vitagraph man a cordial, even demonstrative, greeting. It did not take long for the rest of the audience to recognize the identity of the group from the Flatbush studio, and the applause of the players was heartily seconded. Mr. Lackaye will remember his reception.

IT IS a splendid cast that supports Tyrone Power in "Aristocracy," the four-part adaptation by the Famous Players of Bronson Howard's drama of society. The picture goes over strongly, in spite of the subsidiary actions that divide but never appreciably lessen the interest in the chief division of the plot. Mr. Power has magnetism, the quality of likableness. His is a most convincing portrayal of the successful business man who has no patience with those seeking the society of a self-selected division of the community. Marguerite Skirvin is the young wife of Stockton, not much older than his daughter Virginia. Miss Skirvin gives a good interpretation of the young woman who was fascinated even as she was repelled by the unscrupulous prince. Edna Mayo is the daughter who, through the belief that the man she loves is engaged to another, marries the prince. Miss Mayo gives a performance of marked strength and feeling.

Arthur Hoops is the polished scoundrel whose hastily planned and executed marriage to Virginia terminates with the ceremony and who promptly proceeds to make love to the stepmother of his wife. His death at such an opportune moment forms a dramatic coincidence so characteristic of stage productions. Mr. Roselle provides the lighter touches to this serious story when he tries to evade the persevering attentions of the woman his parents wish him to marry. His work, like that of Mr. Hoops, is excellent.

Director Heffron has finely staged "Aristocracy." There are city mansions and rural palaces; there are great lawns and gardens, materially contributing to the atmosphere of the story. The interiors are lavish and spacious. The picture holds all the way, and at times moves strongly.

NEW STUDIOS PLANNED BY DYREDA.

Plans have been submitted for the erection of a studio and complete motion picture plant for the Dyreda Art Film Corporation, which has been using the old Reliance studios at Yonkers, N. Y., and which has already made two features which will be released through the World Film Corporation.

The plant will cover several acres and will be equipped with all modern devices, revolving stages, etc. The exact location of the new studio has not been given out as yet, but it is understood that it will be convenient to New York City.

The company has decided to spend at least $75,000 on its new home. The interior stage will be 70 by 100 feet. It is the intention of the company to double the number of its releases. The company will produce nothing but features.

Raymond B. West

WHEN the old and original 101 Bison Company first located here over five years ago with Fred J. Balshofer at its head, there was a slim young man in somewhat ill health who applied for a "job." Having a good and ambitious look in his face, he was hired as an assistant to the director. And that was the debut in moving pictures of Raymond B. West, at present one of the best directors in the business, and a star producer for Thomas H. Ince at the New York Motion Picture Co., in the canyon near Santa Monica.

When the canyon studio was first built, with a little "two by twice" stage, West was there. When the lease was taken over and great 100-foot stages built, laboratories erected, and the place cleaned up and put in shape for the production of all kinds of films, Mr. West was still going up hand over hand on the big ladder, and he is still going.

Raymond B. West.

The life of this popular director, before he came out to California, holds but little interest to picture people. In the years ago, back East, stocks and bonds occupied West's time, and he was well known in Detroit as an efficient corporation lawyer, but now he talks only of "shots," "stills," "locations" and all the other words well known to the picture trade. His health failed him, and a life out under the heavens has been his ever since, and he is well satisfied to continue this vocation.

At the present time West is assisting Thomas H. Ince in the production of a great feature picture, written especially for Miss Bessie Barriscale, recently secured by Mr. Ince. The film is "The Cup of Life," and was created by Mr. Ince. The last production by Mr. West is "Rumplestiltskin," a fairy tale by Grimm. Three reels were to be exposed for this picture, but so beautiful was the picture, and so well did West put it on the screen, that it took four reels of positive film after cutting out the edges of the many wonderful scenes. Some of the most artistic settings are shown in the excellent photography, and the cave scenes are especially wonderful. Before this feature, West put out "The Right to Die," an exceptional drama of life. Before that he did "The Defaulter," another drama of the city, and prior to these he was engaged on "The Man and the Leopard," a thrilling animal picture; "The Romance of the Sawdust Ring," a rollicking circus feature in four reels, and many other pictures of more or less reels.

Jack Cohn, editor of the Universal Animated Weekly, recently sent a cameraman to Philadelphia, where pictures were obtained of the S. S. Thelma, chartered by John Wanamaker, leaving the port with food supplies for the war stricken countries.

Notable is the fact that as soon as Mr. Wanamaker announced that such an expedition was being formed, the newspapers in Philadelphia at once set to work and in two days time 2,000 tons of foodstuffs had been amassed. This was loaded aboard the Thelma. U. K. Whipple, the cameraman, also got pictures of many of Philadelphia's most prominent men, who attended the sailing ceremonies.

MATHEWSON IN "LOVE AND BASEBALL."

Again "Big Six" Christie doffs the uniform of the diamond, dons the grease-paint of the studio and takes his place behind the blinding lights and religiously follows the instructions of his director, Stuart Paton. The picture is the second of the Christie Mathewson series, "The Umpire."

The first of the series, "Love and Baseball," took the country by storm. It was not conceivable that the sturdy pitcher could possibly portray the emotions for the screen with such aptitude, but he surprised everyone—himself most.

"Called Back"

Four-Reel Gold Seal Picture from Hugh Conway's Novel—Loss of Memory Turns Dark Crime Into Deep Mystery.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THERE is nothing in the way of incident, even though used a thousand times, that is inherently trite—what makes for the wearying of spectators is the using of any incident—old or new—in the same old trite way. It is the unimaginative way that that old standby loss of memory is so often used that makes it the great bugaboo of spectators. There is a loss of memory incident as the pivot of this story of Hugh Conway's; but it is, strange to say, not a hindrance, but a great help to the offering (four reels long), because it has been used in a fresh and new way.

The heroine has seen her guardian and an unscrupulous villain his friend kill her brother. The killing is done to hide another crime, the dissipating of an inheritance which the guardian had in keeping, the money having gone to help the "cause." The heroine and her people seem to be Russian nihilists who are living in London. The girl, on account of shock, loses all memory of the event. An English gentleman is cleverly brought into the action in the early scenes, as a blind man taken in a London fog by mistake to the wrong house. His key fits and he is in the presence of the murderers, the girl, and the corpse, but cannot see. His eyes are cured; he meets the girl in Venice and falls in love with her; but, of course, knows nothing of the past, never having seen her before. How he with difficulty gets acquainted with and later marries her and, after the wedding, how she regains her memory of the past while her husband is away in Russia to see her father, an exile in Siberia, and to get from him the truth of the girl's past, makes a story that will surely interest. There is a marked sense of mystery all through the picture and this was its chief object.

The scenario was written by James Dayton and we, without having read the book, believe that he has successfully kept the author's intention alive in the picture. For Otis Turner, the director, we have only praise. His players act naturally and effectively and many of his stage sets are far above the average—those scenes in which the London fog is suggested are excellent, while the Siberian snow scenes, although made in California, look to us so like the real thing that they didn't look like studio sets at first—of course, one can see that the flying snow is confetti, but it acts in the wind exactly like the real thing and is impressive. The camera work is clear and good. Anna Little has the role of the girl, with Herbert Rawlinson opposite her in the role of the Englishman. William Worthington plays the girl's uncle and William Guinn, the villainous nihilists who commit the crimes of the picture.

STANLEY H. TWIST CONVALESCING.

Stanley H. Twist, recently connected with the Universal Film Mfg. Co., who has been ill at the Flower Hospital suffering from a nervous breakdown, is convalescent. He left Wednesday for Los Angeles, to his mother's home, where he will rest before resuming his activities with the Universal.

Ed-Au Club on Psychology

WARMER and more interesting at each meething grow the discussions of the Ed-Au Club, which as everyone in the film industry knows is composed of scenario editors and authors. At the last meeting the usual feature of "a paper read by a member" was "The Psychology of the Motion Picture," by William Schrock. His treatment of the subject traced the appeal of light on the optic nerve, the power exerted by movement, etc. He contended that the psychologist author studied the effect on the emotions of the audience and then sought for the cause.

George L. Sargent.

In the discussion which followed, George L. Sargent replied at length. Eligibility to membership in the club requires a candidate to have written at least ten scenarios which have been produced. Mr. Sargent, who was formerly an Eclair director and produced "A Gentleman from Mississippi," said that he had never produced a picture for which he had not written the scenario. He continued:

"Most of us who dream and write our dreams are psychologists by nature. Mere action may make a story, but it is not effective unless a direct appeal is made to the emotions. An author asked me the other day why he could not make audiences weep as other authors did. I told him it was because he did not study the 'mob feeling' of his public. He must watch and listen to them while the picture is on, and he will soon learn the tricks that reach their hearts.

"Then, too, there must be sympathy and understanding between author and director. The lack of this accounts for many of the failures; the producer fails to grasp the true visualization of the writer. I know three high-priced directors with one firm who cannot write a scenario. One of these receives a salary of $330 a week. It is no wonder that there is no unity of mind between these directors and the authors. They do not get the effect of the punctuation of the scenes. When a director puts a comma where a period was intended by the author, the psychologic effect is absolutely lost. There must be closer study of the public as a whole, not as individuals, and much closer contact between author and director, for the best results."

SPECIAL SHOWING OF "THE ROSE OF THE RANCHO."

General Manager Samuel Goldfish, of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, as host, entertained about seven hundred guests at the Belasco Theater, Sunday evening, November 15, the event being the premiere public performance of the first Lasky-Belasco photoplay production of the former stage cameo, "The Rose of the Rancho."

A complete cast of former Belasco players obtained in the picture production and that the picture met with the instant approval of everybody present goes without saying.

Among the prominent guests were William R. Hearst, Otto Kahn, Judge Dittenhoefer, John Mason, David Belasco, B. F. Roeder, William Massen, Daniel Frohman, Adolph Zukor, William Sherry, J. W. Johnston (who acted the role of Kearney in the picture), Eva Condon, Mme. Nazimova, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur S. Friend, Mary Pickford, Marcus Loew and Martin Beck.

Two Simplex machines, a Wurlitzer organ, a twenty-two and piece string orchestra were installed, and afforded the melody for the evening.

The production was staged under the direction of S. L. Rothapfel of the Strand Theater. The magnificence of the prelude and the absolute appropriateness of the music, elicited praise from everybody present.

"The Rose of the Rancho" will be reviewed next week.

"The Best Man"

An Interesting Edison Two-Reel Story by L. H. Lutz, Presenting Marc MacDermott in a Dual Role.

touch to a pure romance of adventure. That he succeeds in laying hold of interest and keeping it alive is largely due to admirable treatment. His subject is so delightfully handled that we divert ourselves of critical attention and settle down to enjoy a rattling good story.

Cyril Gordon is sent on a dangerous mission, that of recovering a cipher dispatch in the hands of unscrupulous financiers, who cannot read it. Cyril is introduced to them as an expert and gains possession of the genuine dispatch by substituting a worthless one closely resembling it. Meanwhile, George Hayne, closely resembling Cyril in appearance, is on his way home from a protracted stay in Europe to marry Cecillia Jefferson. A combination of circumstances detains the bridegroom-elect when the wedding preparations are far advanced, the bride and guests being assembled at church.

Cyril Gordon's substitution is discovered by the crooked financiers as the detective is about to make his getaway. He is closely chased in the belated bridegroom's cab, and some startling effects, startling without transcending the possible, are utilized in the chase. The cab lands him at the church and he is hurried in by expectant friends of the bride. His only chance of escape is to let the ceremony go on, and he presently finds himself married to a very pretty girl, intended as a sacrificial victim on the altar of family vanity. Bride and groom are hurried away to a train, but the villainous detective keeps them in view and takes the same train.

The bride goes to sleep in a private compartment, and the groom site up all night—no stop between New York and Buffalo. This rather delicate situation is worked out in a refined manner and interest is fixed on the groom's schemes for escape. All schemes fail until accident helps him, then the plucky bride goes along. They strike up a mutual admiration society during the adventure and conclude at the end not to interfere with manifest destiny. Mr. MacDermott acquits himself with skill throughout and easily dominates the play in his dual roles from beginning to end. The romance has a flavor of melodrama, but that flavor is the best that melodrama can provide, the flavor of high suspense.

Maurice Tourneur

MAURICE TOURNEUR, director of the Peerless studio in Fort Lee, N. J., a newcomer in the American moving picture field, has just shown by his first three pictures that he is one of the best and most finished directors now on the market.

Though still young in years—being only 32—his career from the start has ever been of the most artistic. Having completed his studies as an artist (painter) he worked seven years with Antoine (the French Belasco); then two years at the Odeon Theater in Paris, and for the last two years has devoted his services to directing for the Eclair Company.

Maurice Tourneur.

His films met with the greatest success in Europe, and in America the Leading Players Film Corporation, which marketed them, realized its best sales with "The Sparrow," "The Lunatics," "Monsieur Lecoq," and various others.

"Being a great admirer of D. W. Griffith," said Mr. Tourneur, "I had always been possessed with a strong desire to come to America. I felt there was something lacking to our French qualities and this could only be remedied by a personal study in this country. I was only awaiting the opportunity, which was afforded me by Chas. Jourjon, president of the Eclair Film Company, at the time when, in conjunction with Jules Brulatour, he was promoting the Peerless proposition, whose new studio has been placed under my direction. I am glad of the occasion to express my high appreciation of the hearty welcome I have met on all sides and which has in a large degree facilitated my work."

The World Film Corporation has already released three of Mr. Tourneur's productions, viz.: "Mother," with Emma Dunn; "The Man of the Hour," with Robert Warwick; and "The Wishing Ring," with Vivian Martin. These three films have shown us the talent of this director under three entirely different lights. First, dramatic emotion; secondly, power, strength; and thirdly, high-class comedy. These various talents expressed in the highest degree by a man who can reproduce with feeling, add to this the minutest care of details, artistic knowledge of settings and costumes, and you have a small idea of the workings of Maurice Tourneur.

Mr. Tourneur is now giving the finishing touches to "The Pit," with Wilton Lackaye, and if credence can be given to rumor we may look forward to another masterpiece.

His next production will be "Alias Jimmy Valentine." This is rendered particularly interesting to Mr. Tourneur as he already staged, in Paris, the French version of this celebrated American drama.

We are happy to record the success which is now crowning his first efforts in this country, and together with the three other directors who are collaborating with him, the Peerless productions can be assured beforehand of a glorious future.

"GERTIE" AND OTHER DINOSAURS IN THE McKAY PICTURE.

Winfield R. Sheehan, general manager of the Box Office Attraction Company, through the good offices of the directors of the Museum of Natural History, secured the use of the classic Museum Building as a setting for some of the scenes in the unique Windsor McKay comedy, "Gertie, the Dinosaurus." It was the first time a moving picture camera was ever brought into the $5,000,000 edifice in Central Park West.

The skeleton of the dinosaur on exhibition at the museum is an extraordinary specimen. The bones weigh about a ton and stretch almost the entire length of the museum floor. The scenario woven about the hand-drawn antics of this huge monstrosity cleverly and consistently makes the story convincing. Many characters of international reputation pose in this story. Besides Winsor McKay, there are Roy McCardell, the humorist, and George McManus, of Newlywed fame.

"The Stolen Engine"

Sixth Episode of "The Hazards of Helen" an Interesting Single Reel, with Good Railroad Atmosphere.

THERE is railroad atmosphere in abundance in "The Stolen Engine," the sixth episode in "The Hazards of Helen" series. Like its predecessors, this is a single reel. So, too, it stands on its own feet, being independent of others. The story is written by E. W. Matlack and Frank Howard Clark, and produced by J. P. MacGowan. It will be released December 5. The picture is well acted, both by the players and the railroad men; that in the cast there are railroad men we are quite sure, but cannot at all times pick them out.

Helen Holmes has the role of a railway telegraph operator who by her nimble wit recovers a stolen package and then a stolen engine. G. A. Williams is Tom O'Grady, a section foreman who is discharged when one of his men leaves a crowbar on the track and derails an engine, later being restored because of his agency in the locating and recovery of the valuable papers lost by a careless express messenger. There is an exciting pursuit of a freight train by a locomotive. The chase is interrupted when the highwayman-tramps uncouple the engine and hold up its crew. The shunting of the freight cars on to a siding and the resumption of the pursuit adds to the suspense. So, too, does the overpowering of the thieves when finally the locomotive catches up.

The doings of the tramps hidden under the car, the fight on the locomotive, and the many scenes taken with the rolling stock under way, are clearly shown. The photographing from a parallel track makes for convincingness and interest. "The Stolen Engine" is an unusually good railroad picture.

PATHESCOPE DEMONSTRATED IN MONTREAL.

Probably one of the most exclusive audiences that ever attended a moving picture show in Canada was present on November 2 at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel in Montreal when the first public exhibition in Canada of the Pathescope was given. The machine is made by Pathe Freres, of Paris and London, and is being distributed in Canada by the Pathescope of Canada, Ltd., which has opened offices in the Drummond Building.

The exhibition was for the purpose of demonstrating the educational and industrial possibilities of Pathescope motion photography. It was attended by some of the leading lights of the Dominion, including prominent statesmen, college professors, lawyers and men and women prominent in industrial and charitable circles. One of the most interesting subjects shown was a film showing the French army manoeuvering under war conditions. Other films showed how the machine could be used to teach geography, history and the natural sciences.

The Pathescope camera, a companion machine to the Pathescope, with which the amateur can take motion pictures as successfully as ordinary snapshots, was also shown. The Pathescope Company is using these machines to take a series of scenes showing troops of the second Canadian Overseas contingent.

Lionel Adams

LIONEL ADAMS, who takes the part of the young radical candidate for Governor in the Kinetophote's coming production, "The Coming Power," is one of the most interesting of the young actors who have taken up pictures from time to time within the past three or four years and at the same time retained their association with the legitimate stage.

Mr. Adams is a Southerner by birth, being a native of New Orleans, where he disproved the truth of the old adage about the prophet who is without honor in his own land. Mr. Adams is among the most popular stock actors who have ever appeared in New Orleans, in fact all over the South. There, as well as in the Northwest, he will long be remembered for his presentation of the leading character in "The Spendthrift."

Lionel Adams.

In New York Mr. Adams is known principally for his performances of John Storm in "The Christian" and of the mayor in "The Man of the Hour," in which he was starred for some time. Previous to that he was identified in principal roles with Annie Russell, William Gillette and Mrs. Leslie Carter. He played in the London productions of "The Heart of Maryland," "Sue," and "Secret Service." Just now he is playing in "Kick In," an unqualified New York success, in support of John Barrymore.

Mr. Adams first attracted attention in the moving picture field by his work with the Lubin Company, being engaged to play the leads in twenty single reel pictures. He next played the heavy lead for the Famous Players in "The Spitfire." He was later offered a contract with the same firm to play the heavies, but the parts are objectionable to him and he declined. Then he went to the Kinetophote to play the lead in "The Coming Power." Mr. Adams says he likes the "movies," and expects to continue to act in them in conjunction with his stage work, which he has not yet made up his mind to abandon.

STAR CAST WITH LILLIAN RUSSELL IN "WILDFIRE."

Famous stars seem to be the order of the day at the Fort Lee studios of the World Film Corporation. The latest one to start work there is Lillian Russell, who is enthusiastic about the making of photoplay from her great success "Wildfire." Edwin Middleton, for many years with the Biograph Company, is directing the production, and among the players who will be seen are Lionel Barrymore; Sam J. Ryan, for many years Tom Lewis' vaudeville partner; Georgie Mack, will be seen as the stable boy—he followed Willie Archie in this role when "Wildfire" went on tour; Glenn White; William Powers, who has been playing Wallingford before the camera, and James Jeffries will play the jockey in the picture. The World Film Corporation plans to release Lillian Russell in "Wildfire" January 11.

FIRST DAVID MILES COMEDY ARRIVES.

Sawyer, Inc., have received from Los Angeles the first picture of the new David Miles Production Co., whose product is to be exclusively marketed through them. Mr. Miles is well known as a director, and his first offering, a single reel light comedy, well upholds his reputation. "Capturing Stella" is a comedy from the same sense that the word "comedy" is used on the legitimate stage. It is a light, sprightly drama with amusing situations and a vein of delicious humor running through the whole piece, but it is not in any way the slapstick type of production which is being produced so much at the present time. Mr. Miles, in a letter, states that "My comedies must have real plot and theme. They must be of the character that will tend to make people go out of the theater in a happier frame of mind, rather than be moved to boisterous laughter over antics whose grotesqueness are their only call upon a claim of being humorous."

"The Eagle's Nest"

A Story of Pioneer Days Told Amid Beautiful Scenes and with Strong Realism—A Lubin Eight Reel Feature.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THE well-known play, the "Eagle's Nest," which enjoyed a considerable vogue some years ago, has now been filmed by the Lubin Manufacturing Co. Edwin Arden, the author-actor, takes the leading part in the filmed version. The scenes were taken amid the wild grandeur of Colorado. The moving picture camera has long ago recognized the value of natural scenery as the best stage setting in the world and we have had numerous film dramas with splendid scenic backgrounds taken in Florida and California.

In the "Eagle's Nest" Colorado is the scenic background. It challenges favorable comparison with the very best scenic environments. Indeed it may be doubted whether finer or more picturesque settings have ever been found and chosen for a moving picture play. We cannot help to mention a few of these wonderful scenes. The one that probably will most please and astonish audiences is a real eagle's nest made in the niche of a rock, part of a steep cliff many hundreds of feet above the earth. The mother bird, a powerful and perfect specimen of her kind, is seen guarding the little brood in the rude nest from harm and danger. A very pretty human touch follows. One of the pioneers who have struck the trail for California goes in search of water and discovers a picturesque stream rushing over the rocks. As he looks up his attention is attracted by the eagle's nest on the side of the cliff. He raises his old-fashioned rifle to take aim but when he sees the bird guarding its young he drops the rifle and leaves the nest undisturbed.

Scene from "The Eagle's Nest" (Lubin).

In the whole range of moving picture literature which is particularly rich in portrayals of early western life, nothing has ever equalled the showing of the adventures of the pioneers. The rushing of the settlers for the land on which they intend to make their home, the long trains of canvas covered wagons, the perfect types of pioneers, men and women, their hardships and sufferings are portrayed with consummate art. Surely, not the least interesting part is the struggle between the pioneers and the Indians. The battle raging around the pioneers' wagons as they slowly form a circle for the common defence and are being hotly pursued by the savages, is almost terrifying in its realism. The climbing of a steep rock standing like a solitary column amid an ocean of stones is a most thrilling and impressive spectacle. Indeed, too much praise cannot be given to the scenic background of this play.

The theme of the story has a strong melodramatic flavor, but it abounds in incidents and there are no pauses in the action. The acting of Edwin Arden was clever and conscientious work. At times it would appear as if the action was proceeding too rapidly and profound psychological changes ranging from utter despair to supreme joy are registered in the space of a few seconds. This is unnatural and has a tendency to impair the dramatic power which the play undoubtedly possesses.

All through the play there are occasional fine touches showing happy inspiration on the part of the director and good knowledge of screen values. On the other hand it must be said that at times the thread of the story becomes tangled and the director seems to lose the perfect control of the plot which is essential. Perhaps some of the gun plays and bar-room fights might be reduced to a flash instead of being painted out. The acting of Fielding is altogether unnatural and theatrical. This artist possesses vigor and enthusiasm, and no doubt sincerely and ambitiously strives for success. If he had some poise and if he could realize that the screen must be a true and simple reflection of actual life rather than a trick mirror he might become a distinguished figure in his chosen line of work. The work of Harry Kenneth, who took the part of Goeffrey Milford, was creditable, and the same may be said of Clark Comstock as Sheriff Haggard. Eileen Sedgwick as Rose Milford had a difficult part, which at times taxed her abilities somewhat beyond their power. She is a young woman of striking beauty which is a great asset on the silent stage but not the only asset required to insure success.

Unstinted praise must be given to the photography which is of even excellence from the first to the last inch of film. Though the feature consists of eight thousand feet there is practically no padding and it would be difficult to cut more than two or three hundred feet without seriously interfering with the story or losing some splendid scenic backgrounds. At a time when padding is a common failing the solid structural strength of the "Eagle's Nest" must be counted a point of high merit.

TO SHOW "DAMON AND PYTHIAS."

On Monday, November 30, at the New York Theater, the Universal Company will make the initial presentation of its newest and most costly feature film, "Damon and Pythias," and two performances will be given daily throughout the engagement. Greece in its days of greatest glory when the friendship between these noblemen was formed and stood its final test. The scenario is full of life and thrill, the scenes showing cities built and burned, battles on land and sea, the games of the stadium, chariot races, classic dances. Specially composed music will be rendered throughout the presentation by an orchestra. More than a thousand people were utilized in the production which was staged at the Universal's California studios at Universal City, Otis Turner being the director. The film has been seen at a private exhibition by the Knights of Pythias, who endorsed it.

"More Than Queen"

Royal Romance Full of Dignity and Beauty, with Remarkable Night Views of Burning Palace (Pathecolor).

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

ONE thing is surely expected by spectators of these romances in which queens and princesses have the leading parts and that thing is dignity. This four-reel Pathecolor, "More Than Queen," has abundant dignity and grace and beauty too, and not by courtesy merely, but in very fact. The story is undeniably sentimental, but it is not produced or acted sentimentally and the impression that it leaves, without being truly heart-wringing, is sufficiently emotional. The beauty of the Queen herself, the charming grace of her son, a boy of eight, for whose sake she is willing to fight for the crown with her ambitious and scheming cousin, together with the extraordinary backgrounds (Parisian parks and palaces) and the perfect sets

Scene from "More Than Queen" (Pathecolor).

(throne rooms and garden scenes) make it an offering that is unusually acceptable. It is colored in the most approved modern style and one group of scenes gives astonishing views of a burning palace taken at night—these make the offering's sensational feature.

The pretty young Queen—a widow—dislikes the life of constant intrigue in the palace where she has to play against the invidious moves of wily relatives seeking to supplant her boy, the crown's rightful heir. Her husband's brother, the grand duke, is the head of the inimical party. The grand duchess is astute and her social position makes her especially dangerous to the Queen. All are outwardly attentive and most respectful; but the Queen's only true friend is a colonel of hussars. As the picture opens the grand ducal faction is scheming to have this man sent abroad as military attaché. This move is frustrated. Then follows a Persian fete—this is pleasing and graceful, as is all the picture, but it is the least interesting part of the offering. Producers will put a ballet in this kind of picture, and some may like ballets in them, but that doesn't make them effective as aids in the story. At the fete the palace is somehow set on fire—the producer must have made use of a real fire in some ostentatious building, else he is a marvel as an effect getter. The colonel rescues the little prince and then finds that the Queen has also gone to the royal nursery and is entrapped. He makes a second rescue and carries Her Majesty out.

He is in love with her and she returns his love; but, naturally, marriage is out of the question. The colonel leaves the country to bury his sorrow. The little king is out riding; his horse takes fright and bolts; he is thrown and dies. Then the tired and sorrow-stricken Queen abdicates. In Paris she and the colonel meet and console each other. It doesn't sound like a strong story and it isn't; but there is much that redeems it in the way it has been pictured. The acting is all that it should be and the scenes are often lovely. It is, we believe, a very desirable offering.

Famous Players to Open Coast Studio

THE Famous Players Film Company has effected plans to re-establish its studio in Los Angeles, where it operated all last winter and spring, and where were produced, among other celebrated Famous Players successes, notable Pickford classics as "Hearts Adrift" and "Tess of the Storm Country."

Albert A. Kaufman, studio manager of the Famous Players, has left for Los Angeles, where he will take command of the producing force being assembled, and manage the studio activities of the western organization. Mr. Kaufman is fitted for this important assignment, both by his native qualities and by the experience he has had in that capacity since the inception of the Famous Players. En route to the coast Mr. Kaufman will stop off in most of the principal cities to study film conditions as they apply to the Famous Players program.

Albert A. Kaufman.

Marguerite Clark will be the first Famous Players star to appear in a subject produced at the western studio, plans for her presentation in "The Pretty Sister of Jose" having already been consummated. Allan Dwan, of the producing staff of the Famous Players, will accompany Mr. Kaufman to the coast studio, where he will be stationed permanently.

It is intended that a number of important and elaborately scenic subjects will be produced at the western studio during the next few months.

WILLIAM D. TAYLOR WITH THE FAVORITE PLAYERS.

A rare alliance of artistic and dramatic understanding and ability has been assured by the engagement of William D. Taylor to direct for Carlyle Blackwell of the Favorite Players Company and there are no two better pleased men in Los Angeles today. For some time now Mr. Blackwell has been quietly looking around for a producer who possessed the instincts of an artist as well as dramatic insight and the knowledge of his plays. In William D. Taylor he has found the right man. Well known as an actor on the legitimate stage, he joined the New York Motion Picture Corporation and later the Vitagraph, with whom he played Captain Alvarez. For some months Mr. Taylor has been showing his quality as a producer at the Balboa studios and his very first picture elicited universal praise. Great things may be looked for from this alliance, and Carlyle Blackwell has laid his company off for a week in order to start "The Last Chapter" with William D. Taylor in charge.

Plans Complete for Screeners Ball

Everything Points to an Unusually Successful Function at the Astor on Thanksgiving Eve, November 25.

ALL plans for the Screen Club's third annual ball on Thanksgiving Eve, Wednesday, November 25, are practically complete. The organist of the great instrument in the Gold Room of the Hotel Astor is to arrange for rehearsals of the grand march. Will C. Smith, of the Nicholas Power Company, who will be in charge of the light effects during the march, has assured the committee of arrangements that there will be something novel when the dancers go through their paces in the chief ceremony.

Jule Burnstein, in charge of the distribution of boxes, reports a gratifying demand from players and film men for space. Mr. Burnstein may be reached at his office in the Eclectic Exchange at 115 East Twenty-third street. The tickets, which at $5 will admit a couple, are going well.

There is a strong contingent of players now in the metropolitan studios and in Philadelphia. Up to date the committee has heard of no one of these who will not be present—men and women; as to the latter it is no secret that the girls of the screen take if anything more interest in the Screeners' ball than do the men. That's saying much, too. The Hotel Astor's orchestra and organ will furnish the musical entertainment and accompany the dancers.

There will be twenty-four numbers on the floor program. President Kirkwood will lead the grand march—and as his partner and co-leader will be one of the best known players of the screen.

MICHIGAN CONVENTION CALLED.

In announcing the date for the semi-annual convention of the Michigan Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, President Peter J. Jeup issues the following appeal to exhibitors of that State to become affiliated with the State branch:

"Once more I appeal to you to join the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, giving you a few reasons. The legislature is about to convene at Lansing, and some of the laws already mentioned to be introduced are, closing theaters on Sunday, State License fee of $100, prohibiting children under 16 years from attending unless accompanied by their parents, state and local censors, etc., all of which we must prevent if posible, and can if we have a strong organization. Here are some of the things the League has accomplished. The National League has had the war tax reduced from a flat tax of $100 to $25 and $50 which had passed Congress, but changed in the Senate through the efforts of Marion S. Pearce, National President, M. P. E. L. of America. The State League prevented all of the above mentioned laws from being enacted two years ago. Brought about 5 reels for a ten-cent show. Abolished the censor in Detroit. Prevented unfavorable ordinances in reference to licensed operators. Recognition of the League by the Film Exchanges, and we intend to fight to have the State Inspection fee of $20 or more repealed or reduced. The admission fee to this league is $5 and dues fifty cents per month.

"Now if there is any valid or good reason why you should not join and give us your moral and a little financial support, I would like to know it, as I consider this as much a part of your business as your film supply for it means your very existence.

"The semi-annual meeting of the League will be held in Room 255-259 Equity Building, Detroit, Tuesday, Dec. 8, 1914, at 10 o'clock a. m., and I would be pleased to see you here at that time."

ALLIANCE OPENS EXCHANGE IN BROOKLYN.

In answer to the demands from Long Island exhibitors, the Alliance has opened an exchange at 1482 Broadway, Brooklyn. This exchange will handle Brooklyn proper, and the entire part of Long Island. H. Grossman will be in charge and has adopted as his slogan "Watch Brooklyn Grow." Among the theaters in Brooklyn that have signed up for the Alliance Program during the past week are the Norwood, the Duffield, also the Venice, of Flushing.

PARAMOUNT'S RELEASE FOR NOVEMBER 23.

The Paramount Pictures Corporation released on November 23, a Bosworth four-part subject entitled "The Country Mouse." The announcement in our last week's issue on page 1156, under the "Paramount Program" releases, to the effect that "Checkako," a five-part Bosworth picture, would be released on that date, is erroneous.

"The Education of Mr. Pipp"

Five Reels. All-Star.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

"MR. PIPP," the familiar creation of Charles Dana Gibson, made famous on the stage by Digby Bell, "has become a film" under the auspices of the All-Star Company. Digby Bell's acting is a delight, but outside of his work I find little in the picture to commend. Dialogue abounds, subtitles abound, but the action is mostly conspicuous by its absence. What action and humor there are might with the utmost ease have been compressed into a thousand feet; in five thousand feet the action and humor become attenuated and a faint trickle takes the place of the full flow. It must have been an herculean task to assemble this picture because even the effort to follow the progress of the scenes makes a decided draft upon the patience of the spectator.

Digby Bell has the power to make us laugh and he does not lose it before the camera, but the rest had best be passed over in silence.

Roland Blaisdell With Kriterion

IT is not only a qualifying experience in the film business that Roland Blaisdell brings to his new position as the private secretary to the general manager of the Mica Film Corporation and also as the assistant general manager. Mr. Blaisdell was for over a half dozen years in Wall Street institutions. After going through the trials of bank and stock runner he was advanced to assistant cashier, in which position he remained for two years, until advised to take a long rest. Later he held a position in one of the large downtown banks.

Roland Blaisdell.

The growing film industry strongly attracted Mr. Blaisdell. He resigned his banking job to take a place in one of the exchanges of the General Film Company, where he remained but six weeks, when he accepted another offer. He was later manager of the Horsley Lumiere agency and then for nearly a year treasurer of the Centaur Film Company.

With Mr. Horsley Mr. Blaisdell acquired an all-around experience in raw stock and finished film and in factory, laboratory and studio work. He has closely followed pictures for ten years—he will celebrate his twenty-fifth birthday this winter—and has studied them as well. He is cool-headed and has a faculty of considering a question from different angles before making a decision. He is a member of the Screen Club. In helping to put the Kriterion program on the film map Mr. Blaisdell should be a valuable aid to his company's officers.

"SEATS OF THE MIGHTY" AT CASINO.

Commencing Sunday, November 29, "The Seats of the Mighty," a photoplay based on Sir Gilbert Parker's novel of the same name, will be presented at the Casino Theater, New York, by the World Film Corporation. Lionel Barrymore is featured in "The Seats of the Mighty," and among the players associated with him in this production are Millicent Evans, Glen White, Lois Meredith, Grace Leigh, Marjorie Bonner, Thomas Jefferson. "The Seats of the Mighty" is said to represent an investment of $100,000 and eight months' work. This feature was made by the Colonial Motion Picture Corporation. Special music has been written for this picture by Professor Harper Garcia Smyth and Ludwig Marum.

STELLAR PHOTOPLAY CO. MAKES GOOD SALE.

Four prints of "Forgiven, or the Jack o' Diamonds," have been sold to the Photoplay Production Releasing Company of Chicago, for Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana and Kentucky by the Stellar Photoplay Company of New York, and negotiations are on to dispose of Minnesota, North and South Dakota to the same company. The picture has been passed by the Chicago censor board.

New Home for Big Supply House

Picture Theater Equipment Company Has Fine Quarters In Its Twenty-third Street Store.

THE Picture Theater Equipment Company is rapidly getting settled in its new home at 19 West Twenty-third street. H. T. Edwards, the proprietor, says that ever since the date of his removal, on November 7, he has been receiving the congratulations of his friends in the trade. On display in the window of his store are projection machines, carbons and other goods necessary in a motion picture theater supply house. The ceiling is of unusual height, being that of the main floor of the Fifth Avenue Building, of which it is a part—twenty-two feet. It is Mr. Edwards' intention to erect shelves on the three sides of the rear portion of the store, with running or traveling ladders.

Prominent on the floor are the latest examples of projection machines—Power's 6A, Simplex, Edison's New Model D and Motiograph 1914. So, too, there are ticket choppers and ticket vending machines, spotlight, with six colors and powerful condenser; turnstiles, safety booth cases, containing six cans into which an operator may place films when not in use; samples of theater chairs, safety fire extinguishers, "exit" boxes, film rewinders, compensarcs, inductors, transformers and motor generators; Model B gas outfits, for use where an electric current is not available. "It is remarkable," said Mr. Edwards, "what a good show can be given with these." Announcement is made in a large ornamental poster frame that the company supplies Mirroroide Screens and Johns-Manville Asbestos Booths.

A showcase, 36 by 20 inches and 20 feet in length, is filled with innumerable parts of different motion picture apparatus. Prominent in the extensive display of condensers are the P. T. E. condensers, a bit of guaranteed equipment that is a special product of the house. Another specialty is P. T. E. oil. There are all makes of film cement. Another showcase, well filled with supplies, is 14 feet in length. There are two wall cases, ten feet in height, containing sixty drawers each, filled with parts. Sample ticket rolls are shown. Carbons there are in all sizes. Mr. Edwards fortunately has an extensive line of these. He bought heavily during the summer, having a "hunch" there was trouble brewing. In fact, in looking over the store one can hardly help feeling that it would almost be as difficult to name what in the way of motion picture equipment is lacking as it is to begin to enumerate what is to be found here. There appears to be every picture theater essential, from cellar to roof, or, as Mr. Edwards puts it, "from lobby to screen."

The company is most centrally located. When the Broadway subway is completed there will be a station almost at the door. There will also be a Twenty-third street station in the Seventh avenue extension. Mr. Edwards said he believed his new quarters would prove satisfactory in every way and that he had allowed for expansion. The old home at 21 East Fourteenth street had simply been outgrown.

Mr. Edwards has been in the film industry since 1907, although for the past three years he has sold everything but the film. He began practically at the inception of the business, that is, in the larger sense. In the nearly eight years that he has given of his energy to this new line of activity he has contributed his full share to the advancement of the picture as an amusement force—for surely artistry in the studio goes for naught if in the theater there be less than the best equipment. Sitting in his fine appointed private office the other day, with the sun streaming in, Mr. Edwards recounted some of the great improvements in mechanical appliances that have taken place in the picture world in the past few years.

"Just come out in the store and see the first motion picture projector and then take a look at one of the latest machines," he said. In looking over this relic of motion picture antiquity one is impressed by its primitiveness. It seems remarkable that it would show a picture. There is no upper or lower magazine. One wheel served both as the feed and as the rewinder. When this contrivance was in use it was customary, first, to let the film roll to the floor and later a burlap bag was used as a "lower magazine." Mr. Edwards says the Smithsonian Institution in Washington will get the machine eventually, as its value from a historic viewpoint is unquestioned.

The Picture Theater Equipment Company has recently filled a unique order from the Agricultural Department of the State of New York. A Pullman car was denuded of all its furniture, and in it was installed a complete outfit for the projection of motion pictures, including a Power's 6A machine. There was also a Model B gas outfit, for use in communities where there is no electric supply. It is the first time that a railroad car has been so equipped. Motion picture exhibitions will be given all the way from New York City to the Pacific Coast, and these will feature films designed to show the agricultural possibilities and accomplishments of the Empire State. The car is due to arrive in San Francisco for the opening of the great exposition, when the equipment will be transferred to the New York State Building.

Moving Pictures Actually Advertise

By Watterson R. Rothacker.

IN a recent issue of Printers' Ink, Mr. George Frank Lord, Advertising Manager of the Du Pont Powder Company, made the following statement: "To educate American farmers in the use of dynamite, the Du Pont Company has spent more than half a million dollars in advertising and demonstration. The principal advertising mediums have been the agricultural press and moving pictures. All good farm weeklies and monthlies have been used, and the films made by the Industrial Moving Picture Company of Chicago have been shown in practically every 'movie' theater in the country."

At the big Exposition just closed at Pittsburgh, the moving pictures made for the H. J. Heinz Company were shown to more than 83,000 people within a week.

Scores of other enterprising organizations of national repute and good advertising judgment, have used, and are using, moving pictures with signal advertising success; so the record of actual moving picture advertising achievement proves the advertising value of motography and sets in a permanent place moving pictures as an established advertising medium.

With moving pictures riding high on the advertising wave, and with millions of American eyes focused on the screen every evening in the year, it is natural that the attention of the investing laymen be attracted to what they consider a source of wealth and opportunity.

And it naturally follows that dozens and scores of made-over-night companies jump into the field with perhaps the best intentions in the world, but woefully unprepared to comprehensively present a moving picture advertising proposition.

In some instances these new companies know nothing of the political angles which exist in the film business. Apparently they really believe that advertising moving pictures can be shown in all the theaters. They have an exaggerated idea as to the number of theaters in the United States, and a greatly exaggerated idea as to the average daily attendance at these theaters.

What's the result? An advertiser is approached on a moving picture advertising proposition. He is promised impossible circulation, and is regaled with a line of stupendous statistics. If he doesn't take the trouble to investigate, he enters into the campaign with inflated ideas, and when it comes time to deliver the goods he finds that he has been sadly misinformed. Then he discovers that it is utterly impossible to secure performances of the hyperbolic promises which lured his pen along the dotted line.

Now, had this same advertiser been told frankly and truthfully the limitations, as well as the possibilities, of moving picture advertising circulation, and had the campaign been judiciously and advisedly charted to reach the circulation avenues really open, all would have been well. Where misrepresentations are made, however, and the advertiser is led to expect a whole lot more than can be delivered, the moving picture advertising profession receives a knock instead of a boost which is its due wherever the truth about moving picture advertising is adequately explained and the contract fulfilled on an honest efficiency basis.

"THE CLANSMAN," GRIFFITH PRODUCTION, COMING.

Announcement is made by the Mutual Film Corporation that "The Clansman," a multiple reel production based upon the Rev. Thomas Dixon, Jr.'s, story of the same title, has been completed by the Griffith organization and will soon be shown in New York. In this feature will be seen Mae Marsh, Blanche Sweet, Lillian and Dorothy Gish, Henry Walthall and other stars of the Griffith company of players. Several thousand people figure in the mob scenes. Griffith directed, of course. The result is said to be magnificent.

LOWRY GOES TO COAST.

Ira M. Lowry, General Manager of the Lubin Manufacturing Company, left last week for a trip to the Pacific Coast Mr. Lowry will combine business with pleasure, devoting considerable attention to the large Lubin plant at Los Angeles.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

"THE EDUCATION OF MR. PIPP" (Alco).

THE Alco Film Corporation announces that Digby Bell, in "The Education of Mr. Pipp," will be released upon Nov. 23. The photoplay is a picturization by Augustus Thomas of his own legitimate play of the same name. The legitimate play is based upon Charles Dana Gibson's drawings, "The Education of Mr. Pipp." Digby Bell, the star of the picturization, played Mr. Pipp in the legitimtae for three years. The production is that of the All Star Feature Corporation.

As Digby Bell himself had been successful all over this country as Mr. Pipp he was thoroughly familiar with the Scene from "The Education of Mr. Pipp" (Alco).

Gibson makeup. But with the women difficulties were encountered. The producers advertised for women with Gibson faces and figures. The response was overwhelming but unsatisfactory. Then the producing corporation threw out a search net for all former models of Mr. Gibson. Two of these proved to be actresses of experience and suited in every way to the parts both as models and as players. The two are Miss Edna Brun, who plays Julia Pipp and Miss Belle Daube, who plays Ida Pipp. Then came the question of getting a Mrs. Pipp, who would not only look the part but would be able to act it to the best effect. Someone thought of Miss Kate Jepson and at rehearsals she proved very effective and the results on the screen were very satisfactory.

There was less difficulty in securing the men. Critical observers have said that Mr. Gibson idealized his women, but drew his men from real types. In any event it did not prove at all difficult to find good actors and "Gibson men." George Irving, Harry Driscole, Stanley Dark, H. D. Blakemore and Frank Patton have the satisfaction of knowing that in externals at least they greatly resemble the originals of the Gibson picturization.

In another way, too, the idea of the Gibson pictures has been carried out. All the localities which Gibson sketched in his background have been utilized in photoplay. The history and doings of the Pipp family in Pittsburgh are also shown upon the screen. The New York home appears in its Manhattan setting. Durland's Riding Academy, Central Park and the other Manhattan localities that Mrs. Pipp visited in her effort to break into society are presented just as Gibson drew them.

In the book of Pipp drawings, "The Education of Mr. Pipp," the former Pittsburgh family is shown journeying to Europe. In the legitimate this was left to the imagination with the aid of a few spoken lines, but in the picturization the wholly interesting, if somewhat socially ambitious, family are shown crossing to the other side. In some picture plays based upon legitimate plays these interpolations have been out of keeping with the spirit of the work, but in the case of Mr. Pipp, the same hand that penned the play also wrote the photoplay scenario.

FRENCH FAVOR CINEMATOGRAPHERS.

It has been officially announced that Pathe Freres have been appointed official cinematographers to the French Government in connection with the war. This much sought for concession will give Pathe a tremendous advantage in the matter of securing authentic and historically valuable pictures of the world's greatest conflict, since it is evident that the prejudice which has existed against the motion picture camera anywhere near the firing line will, to some degree, be lessened when the cameraman bears an official government commission.

In this connection, Pathe Freres announce that the reported arrangement between a branch of theirs in Germany and the German government for the taking of war pictures with official sanction, is untrue. Such an arrangement they say may have been made with a German film company but certainly not with any connection of theirs.

"THE MYSTERY OF THE SEVEN CHESTS" (Selig).

A mystery story involving some adventurous exploits, some spirited rifle and revolver shooting, a motor-yacht chase and the final recovery of a treasured document by a beautiful girl, is well depicted in this Selig two-reel adventure drama, "The Mystery of the Seven Chests," which will be released Monday, December 7. Wm. Stowell furnishes most of the excitement in the picture, as the husband of the adventuress Cleo (Lillian Hayward), whose brother was a bandit and holdup artist working in Western America.

Adda Gleason appears as Rose, daughter of the convict serving a term as a murderer, but the brother of Cleo, the adventuress, was the one who did the killing. Remorse causes him to write a confession, which he secretes in a chest which appears, accompanied by six other mysterious chests, during the progress of the story at various intervals.

Scene from "The Mystery of the Seven Chests" (Selig).

Edwin Wallock plays the part of the society man who buys the chests for the purpose of opening them in the presence of a house party and creating a diversion, because of the mystery attached to them.

This picture is full of life and snappy incidents which will add materially to its successful booking. The scenario was written by James Oliver Curwood, and it is one of the best he has written for the Selig Polyscope Company.

"THE DANCER AND THE KING" (World Film).

A romantic comedy in five reels is offered by the World Film Corporation with Cecil Spooner in the leading role as the pretty dancer who saves her royal lover from the snares of his intriguing ministers. The picture is a Blaney feature and was produced by Mr. E. Artaud. The cast contains such well-known players as Victor Sutherland in the role of King Louis of Bavaria; Howard Dwight in the role of Giles, his confidential adviser and friend—this character is also the foster-father of Dazie, the dancer; and Marguerita Dwight in the role of the countess, the king's cousin, who has sold herself to the Austrian faction for a million crowns and who takes an active part in the conspiracy to force him to abdicate.

There is much in the offering that is attractive and at several points the action is so excruciatingly funny that it is sure to make the heartiest laughter. As the first act opens we find the king's counsel trying to effect his ruin by persuading him to order a four per cent. increase in the taxes.

Scene from "The Dancer and the King" (World).

His friend, the honored Giles, is as earnest to persuade him to decrease the taxes by the same amount. Louis will do neither; but goes to see Dazie, the dancer, performing at the theater. The king is enraptured and throws her a bouquet which one of her shapely toes in dancing fillfully kicks into the pit. This enrages Louis and, back at his palace, he orders the dancer to be brought at once to him. At this point we are shown enough of the early life of Dazie to make it clear that Giles is her foster-father.

Louis is now even more in love with her. The evil countess profiting by this fact sends a false letter that brings the king to an inn where the revolutionists are awaiting to capture him. The capture is easily made, but Dazie and her friends know of the fact and hurry to bring the loyal army to his rescue. The conspirators threaten to kill the king unless he signs his abdication. The mob is waiting and is just at the point of committing the crime when the soldiers arrive.

Breaking all former records in big box office receipts at the Columbia Theater in Long Beach, California, the Balboa Amusement Producing Company's four-reel feature film, "A Will o' the Wisp," was shown at the playhouse named last Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. In the four years since the theater was instituted there never before had been such a great crush of theater-goers, blocking the doors and massing in crowds for several hundred feet from the entrances.

Until Monday the former high box office record at the Columbia was that of "The Pilgrim's Progress," which was shown to vast assemblages three and a half years ago. During the three afternoons and evenings this week, the services of city firemen and policemen were necessary to hold the throngs in check at the theater doors, and hundreds were turned away daily because the playhouse was not large enough to seat the hosts of eager pleasure seekers. On Tuesday evening several women were hurled to the pavement by the press of the surging crowds and for a time it seemed they would be seriously injured, but were rescued by three policemen and carried outside the throng.

Great local interest was shown concerning the big release because of it being in every way a home product, being filmed at the Long Beach studios of the Balboa company and in the river lowlands near the northwest limits of the city, at a time when the country there was inundated by a river flood. The scenario was written by the Balboa photoplay editor, Frank M. Wiltermood, who borrowed the main idea of the play from the old-time melodrama, "Hazel Kirke," showing an aged, blind man alone in his home while a storm rages outside. Among the highly talented players who enacted the leading parts in the masterpiece film were Jackie Saunders, Henry King, Dick Johnson, Mollie McConnell, Charles Dudley and Madeline Pardee.

NEW PATHE SERIAL.

It is announced that, with the ending of "The Perils of Pauline," Pathe will release another serial with substantially the same cast, but showing adventures of a different sort.

The remarkable success of the "Perils" has been the cause of many requests from the exhibitors for another Pathe serial with the same "punches" that have characterized the serial just ending.

THANHOUSER'S "OWN COUNTRY" PICTURES.

Prompt to realize the importance of the "see our own country" sentiment sweeping the United States with an impetus given by disturbed conditions abroad, the Thanhouser management will soon release six one-reel scenic-dramas, showing the wonders of the greatest of federal reservations—Yellowstone National Park.

These pictures were taken with the express authority of the Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, who declared the project "one of the greatest educational uses to which the motion picture camera has thus far been applied." The result is that the Thanhouser pictures will carry to those unable to travel west, the wonders of this greatest of National Parks, Secretary Lane and Lt. Col. Brett, U. S. A., Commandant of Yellowstone Park, cut all red tape, in order that the Thanhouser Company might work unhampered and obtain the best possible results.

FAKING WAR PICTURES.

"I have before me a very excellent and interesting letter written from London by John D. Tippett to Carl Laemmle in New York and recently printed in the Moving Picture World. Doubtless in much Mr. Tippett is correct, but his claim that taking pictures at the theater of war is impossible has proved to be a mistake. The Lubin Manufacturing Company has since the commencement of the war had several photographers engaged in taking war pictures and admitting the risk of life, have succeeded in sending to the Philadelphia plant quite a number of reels depicting actual fighting. To attempt to fake such pictures would be a matter of impossibility. The streets of Alost and Antwerp could not be duplicated here, neither could any artist reproduce the partially destroyed Rheims Cathedral. The films soon to be released by the Lubin Company will be seen by many people who are well acquainted with the stricken country and easily recognize the land marks of their native homes. The Lubin protographers are still at work in Belgium and France and are sending negatives by the first available transportation. Admitting it to be a hazardous job, the fact remains that war pictures are being filmed and will truthfully depict the horrors of the unfortunate situation."

Destruction of Termonde and Alost, in Belgium (Lubin).

The foregoing is Mr. Lubin's summary of the war picture situation as it stands at the present writing. The attitude of some of the warring powers has changed since Mr. Tippett wrote his letter.

"THE MAKING OF HIM" (Lubin).

George Terwilliger has evolved an excellent story with picturesque naval setting, the moral of the tale being the regeneration of a youth of the idle rich by a charming girl who loves him but wants to marry a man, not a society doll. Admiring the manly quality of the naval officers, she spurs her lover to effort by threatening to discard him unless he devotes four years to training under the hard discipline of a naval school. It is "hard tack" for the pampered youth, but he submits to the dictum while the girl, despite the attentions of other lovers, remains faithful to her promise. The picture features Ormi Hawley and Edgar Jones, who are well supported by other famous Lubin players. The picture is 2,000 feet and beautifully mounted.

MULTIPLE EXPOSURE IN ESSANAY PICTURE.

A triple masked exposure marks an unusual feature in the new Essanay prize mystery play, "The Battle of Love," released December 19. In this scene Francis X. Bushman is seen in his office at the telephone on one side and Miss Ruth Stonehouse, his sweetheart, at the phone on the other side. In the center is a picture of a street with the telephone wires. From these wires flash out the message on the screen, letter by letter. This requires a fourth exposure to work the letters into the central picture, making it practically a quadruple exposure to finish the picture.

"THE HEIRESS AND THE CROOK" (Eclair).

A distinctly different type of picture is that released by the Eclair Film Co., Inc., on Wednesday, November 25th, entitled, "The Heiress and the Crook." This picture, in two reels, contains a most interesting and ingenious expose of the "fake spiritualist" game. Because of this fact, it has a decided punch, and the story, which borders on detective mystery, is well told with dramatic incidents and enlivening climaxes. Priscilla Dean and Henry Luzon are featured in this Eclair two-reeler.

"THE HEART OF A MAGDALENE" (Powers).

After all, is there no love like a woman's? Someone said that a woman's heart was meant to break. Should they have added, "a woman's heart was meant to ache"?

For underlying every great tragedy of life, somehow the woman seems to be the real sufferer. In fact there are those who say that when it comes right down to stern reality, the woman in the case bears the brunt of the world's wreckage. What do you think about it?

And if this is so—is it not as it should be? Is not woman, real woman, a frail creature, a creature of whims, one who should be under the protecting arm of the sterner sex? And being frail and tender, is it not reasonable to expect that when a sorrow enters her life, the suffering will be correspondingly keener than that which will affect her lord and master.

Here is a story in which a girl, denied the protection and care afforded most girls, suffers and has her soul washed in tears before she awakens to real happiness—to right living. The woman in the case is woman from the depths, but withal a woman. One with all instincts of love undeveloped, one with a heart steeled to dupe men and take what money she could from them. Her life is bounded by cafes and her associates are all lovers of mammon. And then, one night she meets a young artist. He asks her to pose for him—to pose for the picture of a Madonna he is painting. The suggestion brings a hail of laughter and jeering from her companions, and it is this which decides her to consent. And therein commences the inspiring, heart-interest story.

The locale of the story is in Paris—in the art studios. It is from the pen of Ruth Ann Baldwin, herself an art student, and is based on an incident of which she was a witness several years ago. And while it was written especially for Miss Edna Maison, the play will disclose the little leading lady in an entirely new light; she shows a wonderful power of emotion, of understanding. Her study of the ignorant, unrestrained girl, a product of the city's slums, is a delight to the eye. The play is in two parts and will be released December 4th.

Scene from "The Heart of a Magdalene" (Powers).

PATHE CAMERAMAN HONORED.

General Baumganen, commander of the French troops in Morocco, in a letter to Pathe Freres, has highly praised the conduct of their cameraman, who was present during the attack of Taza. With remarkable coolness the cameraman, M. Pierre Chavarous, while directly in the line of fire, continued to take his pictures with apparently no thought as to his own safety. The pictures secured are said to be remarkable.

BOX OFFICE PLAYERS OF REPUTATION.

Twenty-two features dealing with a diversity of problems and staged amid varying surroundings are being released at stated intervals by The William Fox Box Office Attraction Company under the brand names of Balboa, Nemo and White Star. The players are known to all film fans. Edwin August, with a Biograph and Universal reputation; Dorothy Davenport and Jackie Saunders, featured in Mutual and Universal films; Henry King, Neva Gerber, Henry Stanley and Daniel Gilfeather, all players who at one time or another have starred in films made by Vitagraph, Biograph, Lubin and other manufacturers, are known wherever pictures are shown.

MISS PICKFORD IN "THE DAWN OF A TOMORROW."

The Famous Players Film Company has secured the film rights of "The Dawn of a Tomorrow," the great drama of an oppressed girl's splendid faith and triumph, by Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, which will be utilized as a vehicle for Mary Pickford.

"The Dawn of a Tomorrow" created a distinct sensation on the stage, and is bound to extend its wholesome influence in a much further direction as a photoplay. Mary Pickford may well be expected to make the beautiful characterization of Glad an artistic and powerful conception.

"THE SERPENT COMES TO EDEN" (Lubin).

Lord Cecil and Lady Betty are supremely happy, but their evil genius Carson is still resolved to fight the situation and with the assistance of the Countess Lurovich sow the seeds of doubt in the mind of the young bride and persuade her that Cecil is unfaithful and ashamed of her, thereby inducing her to give him freedom. Before doing so, however, she deeds the Golden Hope Mine over to Cecil and though giving herself over to the conspirators she is empty handed. Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe are excellent and at their best in this number and many of the admirers of the Beloved Adventurer will regret that any circumstance can mar the happiness of the excellent couple.

COSMOS TO SIGN WITH ALLIANCE.

Since announcements were recently made that the Cosmos Feature Film Corporation had re-entered the producing field, there has been considerable speculation in picture circles as to what concern Leo Rosengarten, head of the Cosmos, intended to release through.

Mr. Rosengarten was the recipient of offers from many sources and for a week conflicting rumors were in the air that the Alliance and Paramount had concluded negotiations to handle the Cosmos output. But word now comes from authoritative sources that the Cosmos productions will reach the public and exhibitor exclusively under the banner of the Alliance Program. From the same source comes the news that every detail except the actual signing of the contract has been agreed upon, and it is expected that negotiations will be closed within a few days.

The Cosmos company is to produce and deliver to the Alliance Program one production in five parts every six weeks. The first feature will be Mrs. Thomas Whiffen in "Hearts and Flowers," which is scheduled for release Nov. 30. This will be followed by an elaborate production of "The Little Girl That He Forgot," in which Beulah Poynter will play the stellar part.

FAMOUS PLAYERS TO PRESENT JOHN EMERSON.

It is announced that the first release of the Famous Players Film Company in association with Charles Frohman, following the affiliation effected between this company and the producer last summer, will be John Emerson in the recent theatrical success, "The Conspiracy," the detective comedy-drama that thrilled and amused metropolitan audiences last winter.

Included in the unusually important supporting cast will be Lois Meredith, an important drawing card in her own right, having been the star of the recent dramatic success, "Help Wanted."

TITLES OF FIRST "ZUDORA" SERIES.

Much inquiry has attached to the titles of the episodes of "Zudora," Thanhouser's forthcoming serial. Dr. Daniel Carson Goodman, creator of this new photoplay, has exhibited in his title selections a faint hint of the mysticism and surprising revelations to be expected in this production. The titles of the first five episodes are as follows:

No. 1. "The Mystic Message of the Spotted Collar."
No. 2. "The Mystery of the Sleeping House."
No. 3. "The Mystery of the Dutch Cheese Maker."
No. 4. "The Mystery of the Frozen Laugh."
No. 5. "The Secret of the Haunted Hills."

In each of these episodes the author carries along his master plot through varied themes and wondrous diversity of situations.

SHEP OF THANHOUSER A REAL ACTOR.

Shep, Thanhouser's collie, has recently been acclaimed by critics a great dog actor.

The manner of his work in motion pictures is a study in itself. The dog rehearses his parts and goes through them just like a regular actor and never grumbles or tries to "sass back." When a scene is ready Director John Harvey, who handles Shep, walks all of the cast through their parts and Shep never takes his eyes off the actors, with the result that Shep himself when his turn comes knows exactly the position of the actors and consequently is not bothered by them.

Recently in taking a picture, "The Barrier of Flames," it was necessary for Shep to rescue Helen Badgley from a burning building. The house was set on fire, the fire department arrived and began work. Shep "told" the fireman of the presence in the house of his little mistress. Before the firemen could prevent, Shep scurried up the ladder and led the firemen to Helen. Shep himself carried her to the window, where the willing hands of firemen gathered her into safety.

But they all forgot about Shep. Cut off by the flames, the dog was crouching in the window corner. Then the firemen spread a net and Shep made a leap to safety and into the arms of little Helen. One of the pictures shows this leap and another shows Director Harvey at work with the dog.

Shep seems more willing to work with Helen Badgley than any one else, although the Fairbanks twins, Madeline and Marion, come next in his affections. When Shep is at work he has no time for lovepats from any one. He stands close to Director Harvey, and at the first signal is immediately in his place. He is never told to do a thing twice. Director Harvey has a way of gently impressing upon Shep just the action desired and it is followed to the letter.

PRIEST OR MEDICINE MAN?

An unusual Indian picture is scheduled for the second release of the Mona Darkfeather series, by Sawyer, Inc. It is a romance of the Jesuit fathers who did so much toward the civilization of America. Brave, always facing death, oftentimes captured and tortured, these courageous bearers of the message of religion journeyed alone into the deepest forests and into the wild plains where the bloody Sioux meted out an horrible death to all white captives. The story of "Priest or Medicine Man?" is that of a Jesuit father captured by a particularly bloodthirsty tribe who succeeded in converting them, despite the efforts of the tribal medicine man, who planned his death. Mona Darkfeather plays the heroine as a princess of the tribe, who, inspired by the father, risks everything that her people may also see the light. Produced with all the skill usual to productions directed by Frank Montgomery, superbly costumed, and played in a country of remarkable scenic grandeur, this production should set a new mark for offerings of its kind. Like all the weekly Darkfeather releases, it is in two reels.

Scene from "Priest or Medicine Man" (Sawyer).

"THE CIRCUS MAN" (Lasky).

The next production of the Jesse Lasky Feature Play Company, to be released through the Paramount Picture Corporation, will be the "Circus Man," with Theodore Roberts, a circus story, typically American, made from the book, Scene from "The Circus Man" (Lasky).

"The Rose In the Ring," by George Barr McCutcheon, author of "Brewster's Millions."

In addition to Mr. Roberts, the cast includes Florence Dagmar, Jode Mullally, Monroe Salisbury, James Neill, and Mabel Van Buren.

The "Circus Man," with Theodore Roberts, was released November 19, and will probably be seen for the first time in New York, at the Strand Theater.

The "Circus Man" was staged by Oscar Apfel, and in order to get the proper circus atmosphere and the exact locale, Mr. Apfel and the Lasky players journeyed for two weeks with Barnum & Bailey's circus, using the circus equipment each morning for the making of the production.

LUBIN HAS NEW SERIES ON THE WAY.

Following the series of "The Beloved Adventurer" pictures, which has been successful beyond expectations, the Lubin Company will release a new weekly of the adventures and sad experiences of "Patsy Bolivar." Patsy's misfortunes are continuous and excruciatingly funny. The stories have been written by Clay M. Greene and the first number will be released December 28, and continue one reel every Monday for 14 weeks. The series will, of course, be comedy and doubtless be a worthy successor to the tales told of the good Lord Cecil.

WILL SELL BAIRD MACHINE IN PHILADELPHIA.

Lewis M. Swaab, distributor of motion picture supplies at 1327 Vine street, Philadelphia, has added to his list the Baird motion picture machine, for which he is the jobber in Philadelphia territory. Mr. Swaab also carries in his stock Power and Simplex machines.

"TREASURE OF THE LOUZATS" (Itala).

Hidden treasure, stirring theme of boyhood and manhood fiction, has a charm distinctive, conjuring to active imaginations, dank, mysterious passage-ways and the whirring whirl of ghoulish bats in frightened flight, like ghosts of long-dead buccaneers.

Skilfully, adroitly, has the thrilling thread of the heroic past been interwoven with the present of woof intrigue, villainy and love. Stabbing through the veils of moulding yesterdays, illumining flashes of fight and conquest, the story flits fast and ever faster, rising to crescendos of feeling cyclonic.

There is Lydia, the heroine, in whom we recognize Cabiria herself; her uncle, Count Gerard, scheming, desperate unto the taking of valuable lives to accomplish his ends; Count Jules, humanly, not devilishly handsome, who, were it not for Lydia's falling into the possession of the secret accidentally, would never have known that he nightly slept above a treasure colossal. These three pivotal characters are "fed" consummately by actors of almost Salvini prowess.

As a photoplay of beauty, of power, of living, vital fibre, "The Treasure of the Louzats" lingers in memory like a face we have loved.

Beery grasped it about the neck, tripped it and threw it on its side. It was then lifted bodily and carried into the crate and put on the motor truck.

Margaret Joslin, of the western Essanay comedy company, is an ardent believer in women's rights. She argued the matter with Harry Todd and Victor Potel one evening recently, and they disagreed with her flatly. She was piqued, but let it go at that. She got even next day when she took the part of a suffragist leader in the Essanay comedy, "Snakeville's Reform Wave." The two other actors were the recalcitrant husbands, who were beaten into submission, and voted for reform against their will.

What is at once a distinct innovation in picture making is George Kleine's big feature, "Du Barry." Unique and expensive water color sketches were made for each interior. I certainly have never seen a prettier start than when the horses came up to the barrier."

"Under False Colors," a two-reel Thanhouser feature, in which Florence La Badie will be presented, is the first release of a series of strong dramatic pictures in which this famous young woman will appear. Williams is a duplicate in appearance of "Nicaraguan," who was recently captured by the United States revenue officers while engaged in this nefarious traffic.

Jane Addams, of Hull House, Chicago, is one of the many educators who are anxious to see George Kleine's big new multiple, "Julius Caesar." The famous Chicago woman expects, in the near future, to show "Caesar" to the poor children, embraced by the charitable work of Hull House. The magnitude of the spectacle and its strong human interest features make it highly appropriate for children as well as adults.

Twenty tons of dynamite played an all important part in "Nipped," a powerful story of Japan and the Mexican revolution, that is soon to be released by Thomas H. Ince of the New York Motion Picture Corporation. The story tells of an attempt by a syndicate of Japanese to smuggle ammunition and arms into Mexico and how it is thwarted by an Oriental girl and her sweetheart. The plot is foiled when the shipment is destroyed as it lies in a storehouse on the shores of the Pacific and it was to obtain this scene that Mr. Ince used the dynamite. A battery of eight cameras was stationed at a distance from the location of the explosion in order that the upheaval of earth might be properly recorded. This strict attention to the job resulted in the filming of a spectacular picture.

Miss Violet Mersereau, the charming Imp actress, recently delivered two addresses for the benefit of her fans. The first was at the Harlem Opera House and the second at Keith's Jersey City theater. Both were well received. At the same time, "In Self Defence," a picture in which she played the lead, was exhibited.

Frank Borzage, the Inceville juvenile, whose splendid work in "The Wrath of the Gods" and "The Typhoon," gained him such nationwide praise, made another tremendous hit as the "Dip" in a new story of the underworld, "A Crook's Sweetheart," that has just been produced by Scott Sidney, at the studios of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, in Santa Monica.

Lloyd B. Carleton viewed with considerable personal satisfaction the successful completion of his difficult assignment, "The Walls of Jericho," Alfred Sutro's triumph, which was first produced in New York by James K. Hackett at the Savoy theater. He has lost no time in starting the production of "The Idler" with Charles Richman and Catherine Countiss in the leading roles.

Edgar Jones, of the Lubin Company, claims credit for having antedated all photoplay productions of which night photography is a feature. The battle scenes in "Stonewall Jackson's Way," the Lubin three-reel drama, were photographed at three o'clock one morning, last February after weeks of experimentation. A heavy snowfall added to the difficulties, but the historical accuracy of the battle demanded it. The effect of the exploding flashlight bombs is evidence of the producer's fine eye for artistic effects.

Beverly Bayne narrowly escaped death when attacked by a deadly copper head snake while taking a scene for the Essanay production, "Every Inch a King," in the woods near Niles Center, Ill. She was skirting around some dense underbrush when she disturbed the snake which struck at her. Luckily, she had on heavy riding boots and the fangs were buried in the leather, doing her no injury.

CINCINNATI.

THE Famous Players' production of "His Last Dollar," David Higgins' famous racing play, featuring him in the leading part of Joe Braxton, was the attraction at the Lubin the latter half of last week, although Mary Pickford in "Behind the Scenes" was run an extra day, on account of the popularity of this star.

One of the most important motion picture deals which has taken place in Cincinnati for some time was announced last week, involving a change in the management and policy of the Gayety theater, long known as a burlesque house. The Gayety has been operated as a member of a popular burlesque circuit by the Cincinnati Theater Co., which moves to the Olympic on December 1, or sooner, while the Gayety passes into the hands of the Strand Amusement Company, recently incorporated in Cincinnati. The theater will be extensively remodeled in order to fit it for its new use, which will be for the exhibition of high-class motion pictures exclusively. It is the intention of the management to make it one of the finest picture houses in the country. The deal is understood to be the outcome of a meeting held in New York recently, at which Joseph L. Rhinock and George B. Cox, both formerly of Cincinnati, and now interested in the Shubert motion picture enterprises; E. F. Albee, of the B. F. Keith organization; Harry Davis and John P. Harris, of the Davis and Family theater string, of Pittsburgh; I. Lipson, of the Family and Bijou theaters, Cincinnati, and others, were present. Mr. Rhinock was in Cincinnati this week, presumably on business connected with the big deal, which has created much discussion among downtown exhibitors and the trade in general.

Manager C. C. Hite, of the Mutual Film Company's Cincinnati exchange, has been the smiling recipient of many congratulations from his friends among the exhibitors during the past week, on a subject in no way connected with business. He is the father of a nine-pound girl, born on October 27, and is bearing his new honors and responsibilities very well.

A film exchange which will be under the jurisdiction and general management of Gus Muller, manager of the Cincinnati office of the Warner Feature Film Company, has been opened at Charleston, W. Va. Harry Charnas, of the World office at Cleveland, is also interested in the exchange.

Following a course of procedure which has become rather common during the past few years—changing a business house into a picture show, that is—plans have been presented to the building commissioner of Cincinnati for his approval involving the remodeling of the building formerly occupied by the American Type Founders Company, on Sixth street near Walnut, for the purpose of converting the structure into an up-to-date tea-room, with motion pictures to help the time to pass. The promoters of the plan have not yet been divulged.

The Grandin, which up to a few months ago was a more or less prosperous motion picture house on Madison road, in Cincinnati, and was then converted into a public garage, has proved to be entirely successful in its new form, as the owners are preparing to build an addition to the building.

A new supply house has been organized in Cincinnati, the International Film Products Company having been incorporated last week with a capital stock of $10,000. Those interested in the venture include E. H. Thompson, J. Sagmesiter and others.

A new Youngstown, O., Hippodrome, which was nearing completion in that city, and which was planned as one of the finest places of amusement in that part of Ohio, was the scene of a serious accident on October 26, the cause being a failure of the concrete structure of the second floor, for some cause which has not yet been determined. Three men were instantly killed by the falling mass of material, three more seriously injured, and three others are missing, and may have been killed. The crash came entirely without warning, the whole interior of the building falling through to the basement. The building department of the city has been investigating the collapse of the structure with a view to determining the exact cause of the failure in order that if the city building code is at fault it may be remedied, or to fixing any criminal responsibility which there may be. A concrete expert is among those investigating the matter. The building will be reconstructed, but, of course, its opening, which was to have been held at a comparatively early date, is indefinitely postponed, as the building of the structure anew is a matter of months.

A unique plan of city advertising, with motion pictures as the medium, has been under consideration for some time by the Greater Dayton Association, of Dayton, O. The Old Trails Association is the name of the organization which is handling the scheme, its operations being to take views of various cities, at the expense of the commircial organizations of the cities, showing the views on return trips for a small admission fee and dividing the proceeds with the organization which has them taken. The expense of taking the pictures in Dayton was estimated at $200, which is the cause of the hesitation of the Association.

The Scenic theater, of Ironton, O., opened its doors last week under a new management and with a new policy, the most conspicuous feature of which is that it will show no vaudeville whatever. Only first-class productions will be shown, and a charge of ten cents will be made, indicating the confidence of the management in the public's approval of the new policy. The attendance for the first week under the new management seemed to prove the correctness of its estimate of public sentiment, and indicates that the house will meet with continued success.

The Royal theater, of Hamilton, O., has passed into new hands, Leo Armbrust, the new owner, having resigned a railroad position to become an exhibitor. He is preparing to redecorate the theater for the current season, planning to remodel it entirely next spring. The formal opening, on November 4, was made a gala occasion, souvenirs being given to all who visited the theater on that day. The Universal program, with such features as meet with Mr. Armbrust's approval, will be shown at the Royal.

With bright, warm weather, a big, representative crowd, and some spectacular racing, several enterprising Cincinnati motion picture photographers found the closing day of the fall race meeting at Latonia excellent for the purpose of securing some fine racing views. The Latonia Cup race, in which the thoroughbreds were sent two miles and a quarter, offered a chance to catch them under varying conditions, and some interesting pictures will be shown shortly.

That the average moving picture audience appreciates decent music is indicated, as any observant exhibitor can easily determine, by the better attendance always resulting at a house where this item is carefully attended to. Many exhibitors leave a good deal to the person at the instrument, whatever it is, after its purchase, and permit poor and ill-chosen selections to be ground out without end, to the detriment of the entire performance. The Victoria theater, in Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, is one of the pleasing exceptions in this respect, being fortunate in possessing a really good piano player, whose music many of the patrons of the house have learned to like, as being distinctly and pleasantly different from that offered at the average house.

"Turning 'em away" is getting to be the regular thing at the Orpheum on Saturday and Sunday afternoons, even when there are counter attractions and pleasant outdoor weather. On a recent Sunday afternoon, however, with raw, wintry weather and nothing in particular going on in the city, the crowds which attended the exhibition of the Great Northern feature, "Atlantis," can be easily understood. Business is splendid at the Orpheum on nearly every evening, however, the big house being crowded regularly, which is a good deal more than some of the "regular" theaters downtown can say.

The recent opening of the new Marion theater, of Marion, O., was attended by over 1,400 persons, who crowded the house at two showings of the five-reel Vitagraph feature, "My Official Wife." This represented the use of every one of the 700 seats at both exhibitions, and probably as many more could have been filled just as easily, as crowds were unable to secure entrance, and went to other houses in the neighborhood. The house was decorated lavishly with flowers, and the lighting system, the numerous exits, of which there are seven, and other features, all attracted much attention. The management announces that by actual test a full audience was dismissed in exactly four minutes, indicating the excellence of the arrangements for getting the crowd out in case of any necessity, as well as the elimination of the inconvenience usually attending entering and leaving a popular house.

On Hallowe'en the Southside theater, of Ironton, O., recognized the occasion by holding a mask parade through the house, offering prizes to the best-masked couple and the second best, as well as to the best-masked individual. The house was thrown open to the masqueraders at 8:30, and a large number of them passed down the aisles and back again, much merriment attending the ceremony and the subsequent award of the prizes. The house benefited considerably in attendance by this clever plan for weaving in the celebration of the holiday.

Portsmouth, O., in general, and Manager Tynes, of the Columbia theater, in particular, have a kick coming against the Ohio censors, for the specific reason that those gentlemen failed to place the seal of their approval on the pictures taken of the town's recent "Korn Karnival" in time to get them back to the Columbia for exhibition as soon as desired. However, they arrived in due season, and were as much enjoyed as if they had come at the time when they were expected. The pictures were exceptionally clear for local views, and, as usual, proved very interesting, enabling hundreds of the townspeople to see themselves in motion.

The Majestic theater, of London, O., recently participated with a number of business houses in a rather unusual advertising scheme which has been used by the same promoters in various towns. It involves a voting contest with a library of a hundred volumes as the prize, given to the church or other institution receiving the largest number of votes, the votes being given with purchases at the various stores and business houses participating in the plan. The Majestic found the idea a good one, judging by the number of voting coupons which it issued during the running of the contest.

The Smith Amusement Company, recently incorporated at Alliance, O., with a capital stock of $100,000, plans to construct a handsome modern building to house a motion picture theater. Lemette Smith, G. L. Smith and others are interested in the company. CASEY.

NORTHWESTERN NEW YORK.

THE Rev. Dr. Albert G. Cornell of Park church, Elmira, N. Y., recently preached a sermon in the Colonial theater in that city. At the conclusion moving pictures of Paul Revere's ride were shown. J. M. Buddington, who was owner and manager of the Colonial up to about a year ago, has again purchased the theater and its interests from John J. Farren of Rochester, and others. Mr. Buddington will feature high-class moving pictures. Frank Tress recently won a verdict of $150 against the Colonial. The plaintiff, who is an Italian, claimed he was discriminated against in seeking a seat in the house. In connection with this case several Italian residents of Elmira brought action to revoke the license of the theater, but later dropped the suit.

Musical programs of the highest order are now a feature of the Hippodrome. Mr. Marcus is an experienced showman. He recently managed the Academy and other Buffalo theaters for the Mark-Brock Theatrical enterprises.

Walter C. Moon, who formerly managed moving picture houses on Staten Island and in Brooklyn, is now manager of the Happy Hour moving picture theater, Buffalo. Mr. Moon was born in Buffalo and was a resident here up to 1901. He has made no change in the successful policy of the Happy Hour. The lobby has been embellished with old ivory decorations. The Happy Hour is now under the control of the M. A. Myers Amusement Company, which also has the Linden theater, on Jefferson near High street, and the Park theater, at Briggs avenue and Tonawanda street, Buffalo. These are both moving picture houses.

Recent Buffalo moving picture attractions—Shea's Hippodrome: Tyrone Power in "Aristocracy," also "The Straight Road," by Clyde Fitch; Strand theater, Robert Warwick in "The Man of the Hour"; Family theater, "Life's Shop Window."

The opening of the new Regent theater, one of the most modern and best equipped moving picture houses in the country, located at the corner of East avenue and Chestnut street, Rochester, N. Y., took place recently. The decorations are in gold and rose with gold leaf high lighting, and these colors harmonize well with the mahogany finish of the casings, doors, etc. The semi-indirect lighting of the auditorium is another of its charming features. The pipe organ of the house was designed by the late Hope-Jones and manufactured by the Rudolph Wurlitzer Co., North Tonawanda, N. Y. The Regent is fireproof in every particular. It is built of steel with reinforced concrete, tile and brick. The stage is ample in size for any purpose. A permanent fireproof stage setting has been installed to be used in connection with the photoplays. The balcony is built on the new method of cantilevering. The space between the first floor and the balcony has been devoted to the spacious mezzanine. The operating room is one of the largest and best equipped in the country.

Every woman in Muscatine may feel that any attraction which is presented at the Grand in the future will be worthy of her presence. * * * The same standard will be maintained as to the silent drama as to the theatrical offerings and only those pictures which are consistent without constructive and instructive policy will be shown."

THE Holland theater at Wichita has changed its policy, and instead of a regular service is using features exclusively at ten cents.

For some time the managers of the Parsons opera house have wondered how to turn the "dark nights" into money. They hesitated to try moving pictures for fear that would hurt the house for "legitimate." However, an experiment was made—and now they are making a profit on their legitimate performances because they are able to advertise them by means of slides, and the moving pictures themselves are highly profitable.

The opening of the new Union Station in Kansas City Nov. 1 caused nearly every exhibitor in Kansas getting his service from Kansas City some worriment. Some of the theaters which are supposed to receive their services just before their shows did not receive them until too late to exhibit as planned.

"It is a bitter pill, but the directions' say take it," and this seems to be the attitude of the Kansas City exhibitors in regard to the theater tax. There has been no complaint heard in Kansas City in regard to it, and most of the men feel that they are not being imposed upon. Naturally they would rather see the tax a little lower, but they are not disposed to get excited over the rate since it has already passed. Collector Burton of the Kansas City revenue offices is now preparing a schedule and will commence to collect under it in a few days. There will be about ninety-six moving picture theaters in Kansas

Brick, manager of the Garden theater, who prides himself on the number of automobiles he can count every evening in front of his theater, has startled the cynics by taking advantage of the war stringency and the disbandment of the local symphony orchestra by installing not only a ten-piece orchestra in his 800-seat house, but also electric bells and a fountain. He has raised his price to fifteen cents, but keeps his house full.

This has certainly been a moving picture week in Toronto. Because some of the German members of the chorus of "The Tenderfoot" refused to cross into British soil, Manager James Cowan was forced to show "After the Ball," at the Grand theater. The theater was filled on the first night and for every other night during the week, although Annette Kellerman in "Neptune's Daughter" was also drawing full houses at the Princess, which would otherwise have been dark. This coincidence has caused considerable comment around town as last week and this are the first two weeks this season that Manager Sheppherd at the Princess has made any money, although he has had some of the best shows on the road, including Lady Luxury and Maude Adams, in his theater.

Manager Shea at Shea's hippodrome has decided to cut out two of his vaudeville acts at each show and will replace them by a feature film. The scenario competition run by the Conness Till company for Canadian scenarios to be produced here brought in over 500 answers from would-be scenario writers in Toronto alone. The prizes have not yet been awarded. The winning scenarios will be shown in local theaters shortly. DAVID.

A stimulus to action in the matter of inspection of films seemed to be that other women's organizations elsewhere were doing it.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

WASHINGTON.

NOW that the courts have decided that it is illegal to give exhibitions of baseball on Sunday, various reformers are again agitating a movement for police regulations covering moving picture theaters which will prohibit their giving exhibitions on Sundays. A resolution asking the District Commissioners to create immediately a police regulation closing the moving picture shows in Washington on Sunday, was adopted by the Sunday School Association of the District of Columbia at the close of its twenty-first annual convention. The resolution also calls upon every Sunday school in the city and all allied organizations to petition the Commissioners to take such a step. The petition, in part, sets forth: "We rejoice that there is human law sufficient for the decision of Justice Robb that Sunday baseball in the District is illegal, but we deplore the fact that there is no law to restrain those who are thoughtlessly desecrating the day in other ways." To what extent motion picture exhibitions, the most orderly of public amusements, constitutes a desecration of the Sabbath is a question. Surely no work is involved in viewing motion pictures; those who are on duty at the shows are there of their own accord. A woman will go to a show to rest after a strenuous day of shopping; if Sunday is a day of rest, no doubt "rest" is observed by those who wish to enjoy a quiet, and it must be acknowledged, rather tame form of amusement. It is indeed regretted that there are always those who must find something to remedy, either real or fancied, and in whom the "uplift" movement is strong, for perhaps there are those who do not want to be "uplifted," and conditions that it is not desired be changed.

Somewhat in line with the above are the recommendations of Policeman J. E. Petersen and Captain Charles C. Estes, the two members of the police force charged with the enforcement of the child labor law, in a report made to Major Sylvester, superintendent of police, and by him to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. In his report he says: "I also have the honor to recommend that an amendment be inserted in the police regulations which would prohibit the manager or one in charge of a moving picture theater or park from admitting to such theater or park any child under the age of twelve years, unless accompanied by a parent or guardian or some other adult, and having it devolve upon the manager or person in charge of the theater or park to see that no such child is admitted in violation of this regulation." Captain Estes also recommends that proper legislation be enacted or the police regulations amended so as to provide that no child under the age of sixteen shall be permitted in any theater or other place of public amusement in which burlesque performances are conducted.

E. Zarouni has opened the Belmont theater on Fourteenth street, Northwest.

H. F. Lavalle, manager of the Washington Film Exchange, is on the sick list suffering from a severe attack of grippe.

An Animatograph has been installed at the local office of Warner's Features on Ninth street. This machine will be put into operation two or three times a week that the employees of this branch office may have an opportunity of viewing new productions as they may be received. The Animatograph will also come in handy in the settlement of disputes arising from complaints of exhibitors who may claim, rightfully or otherwise, that films sent them are not all that could be expected. Mr. Lust states that this machine is already proving a great help; its operation is simple and in view of the fact that it is constructed along fireproof lines, it can be set up almost anywhere without danger. For this latter reason an expensive booth is not necessary and private exhibitions can readily be given in the office.

W. S. and James Wickham, who reopened the Dixie theater, at Eighth and H streets, Northeast, formerly operated a string of motion picture houses in New York State. On November 14, the day of opening, double admission tickets were used, the coupon being held by the purchaser for participation in a drawing for prizes.

The drawing after the seven o'clock show was for a large bon bon dish; after the eight o'clock show, for a nest of five small (about two-ounce) drinking cups and a case to hold them nest fashion; after the nine o'clock show, for a cream pitcher and lump-sugar bowl. All of these were of quadruple silver plate and were gold lined. In addition to these prizes each lady on both Saturday evening and during Sunday shows was presented with roses, more than five hundred flowers having been procured for this purpose. The Dixie has a seating capacity of 400.

The activities of the Department of Commerce in the matter of the prevention of the shanghaing of unfortunates aboard the oyster boats which pertained in the old days, are to be filmed for exhibition purposes at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. The motorboat "Tarragon," operated by the Department of Commerce for such police purposes, has already been sent to Baltimore harbor. This boat is to be shown watching out for violators of the navigation laws and overhauling oyster dredgers to ascertain whether or not they provide properly for their crews. In the meantime, a scene is to be laid in the office of a shipping commissioner; some fellow assuming drunkenness, will sign papers which will mark the commencement for him of a series of rough treatments. He will be bundled on to an oyster boat, given bad quarters, very little food, plenty of abuse, little in the way of clothes, and, in the cold winds of Chesapeake Bay, forced to dredge oysters for a tyrannical skipper of the boat in whose service he had been forced to enlist. The dredger will become sober and desire to get away, but will be miles away from land, out of sight of boats, and forced to keep on working. That was the way it used to be, until the government became active in suppressing shanghaing. Then the little "Tarragon" will be seen coming on in the distance, and finally the oyster boat will be boarded. The skipper will be seen endeavoring to convey to the government officials that his crew are satisfied with all conditions, but the "hero" of the play will come forward and plead for liberation. His case will be heard and the grand finale will be the passing of a tow rope to the boat which will be carried to the docks in Baltimore and her skipper to a safe resting place in jail. A feature of the show, which is to be a part of the exhibit of the Department of Commerce, is to be an oyster dredger whose officers were sent to the penitentiary for shanghaing.

A fall into the waters of the Eastern branch of the Potomac, which came very near resulting disastrously, put a sudden end last week to an air voyage over Washington by A. C. Beach, the aviator, and A. J. Sutton, a local cameraman, in a flying boat belonging to the former. The flight was made for the purpose of taking moving pictures of interesting points about the city, and everything was lovely until the machine swung over the river at a height of several hundred feet. Suddenly the engine stopped and Beach volplaned toward the river's surface. When about fifty feet from the water the craft plunged forward and fell. Beach and Sutton held on to the machine, which floated until rescued by a passing motorboat.

CLARENCE L. LINZ.

TENNESSEE.

CONDITIONS have improved considerably in Tennessee during the past few weeks. The moving picture houses are handling good crowds and have been doing a nice business in spite of the war and other conditions which are unfavorable to a great many lines of business.

Nine moving picture houses of Chattanooga recently took part in an effort to raise funds for building a home for the labor unions of the city. Sunday pictures were run in these houses and a contribution box was placed at the doors of each for those who wished to help in the movement, no definite admission charge being assessed. Over 10,000 people attended the Sunday afternoon performance between the hours of 2 and 6 o'clock. This attendance was greater than that of the combined churches of the city during the entire day, according to statistics gathered. In the four houses of the Quality Way, 4,500 persons passed the doors. The Picto and Alcazar each handled 1,400 persons. The Royal, on Main street, had 1,700, and the two East Ninth street houses had a combined attendence of 1,700. A film made on Labor Day was switched from one house to the other and attracted a great deal of attention. Voluntary contributions to the cause totaled $352.16, according to a report after the money was counted from the nine houses. Only one theater failed to draw well and that was a Negro theater, far out on Ninth street. The laboring man and his family predominated in all the houses.

A great deal of interest is manifested in Chattanooga and other Southern cities in a plan to reproduce the famous historical raid of Col. Andrews and his band of Union soldiers in moving pictures. This raid was one of the most talked of events during the Civil War, and is very interesting to the Southerners. The Photoplay Library Company, which was to have made the pictures, has not finished its organization so far, and it will probably be some time before the pictures are made. The Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway made arrangements to allow the famous engine "General," which for many years has been on a platform in the big depot at Chattanooga, to be used for filming this picture. The old engine was sent to the shops and put in first-class running order, and is able to make fifty-five miles an hour under its own steam with a string of cars. The engine for many years has been on the platform, which is surrounded by a brass railing, and is one of the interesting sights in the city. The railroad company uses it as a calendar advertisement, and it has also been reproduced on postal cards throughout the South. Although the old woodburner is nearly sixty years old, it was only necessary to spend about $200 to place it in good running order. It is probable that with new and improved valves the old machinery is able to make better time than she could during the famous railroad chase.

S. I. Connor, manager of the Bon Ton Film Company, and commissioner of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition management, said that many contracts for purchase of space on the Tennessee film for exhibiting pictures of the State have been lost on account of the disturbed business conditions brought about by the war. Mr. Connor was recently in Chattanooga, where he was superintending the motion picture work. Plans have been modified so that 15,000 feet of film instead of 20,000 will be the minimum for which contracts will be written. The exposition pictures will shortly be circulated throughout the State and shown preparatory to being sent to the exposition.

GEORGE.

KENTUCKY.

CLEAR, cool weather in Louisville is holding attendances up nicely at the local moving picture houses. The fall has been one of the openest known in years, and hardly any rains or really cold weather has been experienced. Everything is running smoothly and very few complaints are to be heard just now. A number of the outskirt houses have been forced to sell standing room only on several occasions lately.

The Central Film Service Company of Louisville is preparing to distribute to all its patrons a twenty-four sheet size poster of all prominent features as they come out. These posters will be used on billboards, barns or other buildings which afford the proper space. The exhibitors are generally complaining of the weakness of the small posters, and the new size should take very well with them.

The Empire theater, at Shelby and Market streets, Louisville, is diversifying its program somewhat by running single vaudeville turns two or three times a week. Business is remarkably active with this house this fall. The house was enlarged considerably a few months ago, but no trouble has been experienced in filling the additional seats.

B. F. Keith's theater in Louisville raised prices to seventy-five cents for the first sixteen rows this season. The whole first floor was fifty cents at the old house, but better productions and a finer theater warranted the increase.

Labor difficulties arose over placing the seats in the new Alamo theater, Louisville, of the Fourth Avenue Amusement Company, and thirty union men working on the building struck. The seat-placing work was being done by non-union labor. Arrangements were made whereby this work was to be done by the Iron Workers' Union, and the trouble was settled. Work was hindered somewhat when a drilling machine, used for drilling bolt holes in the concrete floors for fastening the seats, was broken, and until new parts could be secured from Chicago the drilling had to be done by hand tools. Cool weather has kept the walls from drying out as rapidly as was expected and a large battery of salamanders was placed in the building to take out the dampness. The house will shortly be ready to open, although it is probable that the opening will be held before the house is entirely finished.

The Mary Anderson theater, Louisville, has inaugurated what is known as surprize night at the popular photoplay house. A special feature out of the ordinary is given as an added attraction every Friday night. The first surprise was Frozini, an accordion star, who was playing at B. F. Keith's theater during the week. The proposition took so well that a good vaudeville entertainer will be arranged for every week, but no announcement regarding what or who it is to be will be made in advance.

Wholesome fun, combined with educational training and sound moral influence, is the standard set by the Censorship Committee of moving pictures for school children, which are shown at the Mary Anderson theater every Saturday morning. Among recent pictures shown at this theater for the little tots were "The Coming of Columbus," "Cinderella," "Chrysanthemums" and the "Runaway Leopard." The comedy pictures appear to please the juveniles most, but a good deal of interest is also taken in the geographical and educational features. Members of the Censorship Committee believe their work is essential to the welfare of the school children of Louisville, for whom they say "there is nothing too good," and they will make every effort to keep up the standard they have set for the entertainments offered the youngsters.

Frank E. Hammer, manager of the Mutual Film Corporation, Louisville, is now settled in his new offices in the Alamo theater building. He reports business very good this fall and is taking on a number of new show houses. He has booked the two-reel Keystone comedy, "Dough & Dynamite," in which Charles Chaplin stars, with the Alamo theater for its first two days' run. It will be shown at the Walnut theater afterward.

A motion picture camera, operated by J. A. and S. J. Needham, of the Quality Film Company, of Newport, Ky., attracted a good deal of attention recently in Flemingsburg, Ky., where the operators were taking city scenes. This was the first time a motion picture camera had ever been seen in operation in that city. The pictures were afterward shown for two days at the Princess theater.

It is rumored in Winchester, Ky., that Cincinnati men are interested in a movement to establish another motion picture house in the Bluegrass City. Negotiations are said to be on for a lease, but no definite details can be secured.

The Gurnee Amusement Company, of Lexington, Ky., has been organized by N. Van Houten Guernee, D. H. Long and Emmet O'Neal. The concern is incorporated for $1,000.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

SAN FRANCISCO.

THE Strand Theater Company has been incorporated here with a capital stock of $100,000 to conduct theaters and moving picture shows, the directors being J. T. Fleming, J. Marcus, W. Morris and E. W. Smith.

An effort is being made by Sid Grauman to secure a long-term lease on property at Fourth and Market streets, now occupied by a two-story store and office building. In case the negotiations now pending are successfully concluded, a class A theater will be erected there at a cost of $200,000. Preliminary plans for the building have been made by Architect William Beasley, 127 Montgomery street.

A number of local houses have joined the ranks of the ten-cent theaters during the past few weeks, prominent among these being the Odeon on Market streets. This theater was formerly known as the V-Odeon, but since it has been refitted and refurnished and the price of admission raised the name has been changed.

So satisfactory was the attendance at the recent engagement of "Salomy Jane" at the Portola theater that a return booking for December has been made. This week the attraction was Evelyn Thaw in "Threads of Destiny."

The California Motion Picture Company has secured the services of Nicholas A. Covarrubias, who will appear in another production to be made by this company depicting California life in the days of '49. This veteran was one of the first United States marshals appointed in this State, and is conversant with the rough life of the gold rush days. He is well known on the Coast as the impersonator of Don Gaspar de Portola in the Portola festivals held at San Francisco.

Representatives of the various Women's Clubs of this city recently called upon Senator Eddie Wolf to ask his attitude on a proposed measure to prohibit the attendance of girls under the age of sixteen years at moving picture exhibitions depicting sex problems. He has taken the matter up with the Screen Club of San Francisco and a committee has been appointed to investigate the matter.

The Forestic theater, located in one of the leading residence districts of the city, is now being conducted under the management of Lesser & Lamb.

The great attraction "Cabiria," which enjoyed a month's run in this city shortly after its release, is now being booked on the Coast by the Golden Gate Film Exchange, Inc.

H. J. Lewis, who for the past twenty-five years has been a guide in San Francisco's Chinatown, has had a five-reel picture made showing the life of the Celestials, opium dens, gambling joints and scenes seldom viewed by outsiders. He is planning to start East with this attraction shortly, accompanied by a Chinese family, and will lecture as the picture is thrown upon the screen.

L. G. Dolliver, business agent of the local Operators' Union, and operator at the Lincoln theater, has given up the latter position and in the future will devote his entire time to organization work. It is believed that during 1915 there will be not less than one hundred machines in operation daily on the Exposition grounds, with an increase throughout the entire city.

The Opal theater on Sixteenth street, near Mission, is preparing to make a number of improvements in its operating room, chief of which will be the installation of a new Powers Cameragraph No. 6A.

R. E. Stebbins, who is connected with the local office of the Pacific Mutual Film Corporation, has been made general manager of the Film Exchange Board of Trade of San Francisco, and Maurice L. Asher, attorney for the organization, has been made secretary, O. V. Traggard retaining the position of treasurer.

J. R. Crone, manager of the Los Angeles and San Francisco branches of the Pacific mutual Film Corporation, left recently for the southern city to meet Mr. Hutchinson, of the American Film Manufacturing Company, who is coming to spend several months on the Coast.

The Pastime theater, Haight and Fillmore streets, has installed new projection equipment.

A change has been made in the plan for fitting up offices for the Alco Film Corporation of California, and instead of this concern being located in a new building on Eddy street, quarters are being made ready in the building at 234 Eddy street, occupied by the Golden Gate Film Exchange, Inc. Additional space has been taken here and the new quarters will be ready for occupancy within a short time.

Harry Hunter, manager of the Los Angeles branch of the Independent Film Exchange, visited the San Francisco headquarters of this concern recently, accompanied by Mrs. Hunter.

Alex. Beyfuss, general manager of the California Motion Picture Corporation, left this week on another business trip to New York.

The Liberty theater in the North Beach district has been refurnished and redecorated and a marquese installed. It will reopen shortly with W. R. Dailey in charge.

Fred Granville, cameraman of the Sunset Motion Picture Corporation, is back from a seven months' trip to the Arctic regions where a wonderful series of films was secured.

Since holding the annual convention of the Exhibitors' League of California at San Francisco in October more than twenty-five new members have been added, almost all being from the country districts.

The Crystal theater has been opened in the Abbott Building, Porterville, Cal.

The Burlingame theater, Burlingame, Cal., has booked "Cabiria" for presentation at an early date and has been very successful in selling seats in advance at 50 cents. A Powers Cameragraph No. 6A and a Wagner converter is being installed in this house.

The Webster Playograph, Alameda, Cal., has been remodeled and opened for business, after having been closed for a short time by the new owners.

Th Broadway theater, Oakland, Cal., departed from its usual routine recently and booked "Salomy Jane" for a full week's run. The lobby of the theater was decorated specially for the occasion with evergreens, with the ticket booth covered with redwood bark after the fashion of a log cabin.

INDIANA.

THE Star theater, Owensville, Ind., donated a night for a lecture on Hog Cholera by Professor Starr of Purdue University. The University is giving illustrated lectures. The action of the Star theater is part of a general movement in Owensville to keep down this disease.

Darue Fisher, Lapel, Ind., is once more owner of the Electric theater, having bought it from I. F. Huffman. It has only been a few months since Mr. Fisher sold the theater to Mr. Huffman.

Chas. R. Offutt has taken charge of the Wells Bijou theater at Evansville. The house is owned by Jake Wells. Mr. Offutt has been associated with Mr. Wells and his various theaters for the past twelve years. He came to Evansville from Nashville, Tenn., and prior to that time he had charge of the Chattanooga house owned by Mr. Wells. The policy of the house will not be changed, according to Mr. Offutt, except that he intends to discontinue the popular priced musical shows which have been a Sunday feature. The musical show will be fixed for vaudeville and legitimate attractions.

The Lincoln theater, Valparaiso, Ind., has added an orchestra made up of young men from Valparaiso University.

The new Grand theater, one of Switows theaters at New Albany, Ind., is now giving five reels for five cents and playing up the fact that the amusement is being offered at a penny a reel. They do not reconcile this statement with the fact that on Saturday and Sunday they charge ten cents for a six-reel show. However, this is no reflection upon the house, as the Saturday and Sunday shows are feature shows and more than worth the money.

The Kai Gee theater, Rochester, Ind., has organized an orchestra from local talent and is now giving good music each evening.

The Camp Fire Girls shared in the profits of the Gem theater, Indiana Harbor, when the theater put on a feature bill. The girls worked up an attendance which packed the house.

John Wolf, manager of the Rumely Hotel, Laport, Ind., has bought the interest of Wilbur J. Hall in the Madison theater, Michigan City. Mr. Wilbur will act as manager of the house.

Art Smith, Auburn, Ind., has signed with the Loyal Order of Moose to fly his biplane for a moving picture to be put on at Grant Park in Chicago. Smith is a daring aviator and expects to loop the loop for the moving picture and also to take a moving picture machine and operator up with him.

The Indiana Union, an organization of students in Indiana University, has contracted for some reels by the Famous Players Co. and the Paramount Film Co. The machine for the Union was bought by Professor Cogshall in Chicago and will be in service soon.

Manager Vinyard of the Star theater, Winslow, Ind., has had the entire house repainted and redecorated inside and out.

E. J. Caldwell has opened his house in Coatesville, Ind., and has been getting good sized crowds every night. He has installed a mechanical orchestra. The house was crowded to capacity on opening night and Mr. Caldwell has been agreeably surprised to find that the crowd every night since has been practically the same size. The house seats 400 and there have been standers every night.

George Weaver opened a new house in Auburn, Ind. It seats about 300 and is a well-equipped and thoroughly modern little house. The first night show was well attended.

G. D. Leinberger, retiring postmaster at Bainbridge, Ind., has bought the Bainbridge theater of Herbert Moore.

Harry Colvin has sold his interest in the Col-Dav show house to Ote Hanger. The house name was a combination of the names of Messrs. Colvin and Davis. Mr. Hanger has indicated that he believes the name should stand.

A. Z. Zaring and J. M. Rhodes, owners of the North Star and Garrick theaters, Indianapolis, expect soon to make these houses ten cent houses and every night a feature night. At present they are giving feature shows every other night, and the attendance for the ten cent nights is always heavier than on the five cent nights.

Mayor Batchelor has declared that he will not permit Sunday pictures in Marion, Ind., and following that declaration, Howard and Goldie Spurr of the New Grand were arrested for keeping open. The house was crowded inside and out when the police arrived. The Spurrs were told to discontinue the show when the reel had been completed. Instead of doing as they were ordered Mr. Spurr put on another reel and started to run it. The police then interrupted and both Mr. Spurr and his wife were arrested. The case is to be made a test case and every exhibitor in Marion is standing back of the Spurrs. In event of an unfavorable decision the case will be carried up. The attitude of the press in Marion in the situation is against the Sunday show, but the people of Marion seem to be with the exhibitors; at least it is certain that if the houses were open on Sunday they would be well attended.

J. P. Dunn, Indianapolis city controller, has declined to recommend an appropriation of $150 to be used in the purchase of a "Safety First" film to be exhibited in the moving picture shows of the city. The purpose of the film was to show how street and traffic accidents can be avoided. The estimated cost of the film was $500. The sum was to be raised by subscription under the direction of the Hoosier Motor Club. It is likely that the Hoosier Motor Club will now attempt to raise the money unassisted.

The Royal theater, Portland, Ind., has been opened by Manager Ludy. The theater was closed a good share of the year. The program will be composed of moving pictures.

The Interstate Theaters Company, Ohio, has been incorporated in Indiana for $12,500; the directors are R. Hall, R. Haggard and W. Geltz.

DETROIT.

THE Globe theater, at Grand River avenue and Trumbull avenue, is having a number of improvements made in the way of redecorating and will also be equipped with a pipe organ.

The latest song that promises to be extremely popular, and of which the local publishers plan to sell over a million copies, is "Mary Pickford, the Darling of Them All." It was sung for the first time on any stage at the New Empire the week of November 9, by Frank Rose. Every music store in the city has literally plastered their windows with advertising and copies, boosting this new song number. The tune is of the catchy waltz style.

George R. Buyce succeeds Mr. Irons as manager of the Royal, the latter going to the Liberty as successor to Mr. Moule, who was transferred to the Alhambra.

C. E. Pudrith, proprietor of the Addison theater, has returned from the west, where he made a hurried trip owing to the sudden illness of his brother, who was on his way to the coast.

The Detroit Brick Manufacturers' and Dealers' Association plan a campaign of advertising slides in the moving picture theaters in February. Those theaters constructed of brick will throw a slide something on this order, "This Theater Is Built With Brick. It Is Absolutely Fireproof." The purpose of the campaign will be to boost building brick.

L. B. McKittrick, vice-president of the Melachrino Cigarette Company, was in the city this week and told the writer that a new concern, in which he was financially interested, had just started in business in Elyria, Ill., for the manufacture of a new moving picture machine. The company is styled the Vandiscope Company, and the machines are being made in the same building with Garford trucks.

Detroit film exchange men are greatly interested, to say nothing of being highly elated, over the recent decision by voters in Kalamazoo to permit the operation of play houses on Sundays. Heretofore Kalamazoo has been without Sunday entertainment, owing to a city ordinance prohibiting same. At the polls, November 3, the people, by a majority vote of 150, decided in favor of Sunday shows, which will start November 22, according to notices already posted. As practically all the film shown in Kalamazoo are purchased through the Detroit film exchanges it will readily be seen that the increase in business, taken on the basis of the year, will amount to considerable.

Architect W. S. Joy, 516 Stevens building has revised his plans for a picture theater and store building to cost $10,000, which he will erect. The new structure will be of brick and stone, two stories high, 50 by 115 feet in size.

The two-hour free picture entertainment, given by the Miles theater preceding the regular vaudeville show, is proving a big drawing card. Where heretofore the theater has had a fair matinee business, it now plays to capacity every afternoon.

The new Majestic being erected at Woodward and Willis avenues will have many special features, one of which will be the outside lighting; there will be no lights on the front of the building, but it will be illuminated at night by lights and reflectors which will be on posts at the curb line. SMITH.

MONTREAL.

BUSINESS in Montreal, of late, has not been up to the usual mark, although from some quarters come reports that business could be hardly better. A few of the smaller shows are in liquidation, but these have always been looked upon as rather "shaky" propositions. However, it is only natural, since Canada is directly involved in the war, that business should fall off somewhat, just like other industries. As long as the exhibitor shows good films he will have no reason to complain. No better proof of this could be produced than that which was recently witnessed in this city. A large West End house screened a special feature which had had long and successful runs in the large American cities, and the result was that the "S. R. O." sign was hung out at nearly every performance. The people must be entertained. As one prominent exchangeman puts it, "the moving picture show will go out of business when the baker goes out."

Our congratulations to the management of the Mount Royal theater, which only recently celebrated its first anniversary. The Mount Royal has filled a long-felt want in the North End. All praise is due to Mr. Herring, the manager, who has established this house on such a sound basis and of such a standard that it is the general meeting place in the annex, because of its good and wholesome programmes. The best testimony of its success is that go there any night in the week and you will find it jammed to the doors. "The Master Key" and "Zudora" have have been booked for the Mount Royal.

"Neptune's Daughter," the big Universal special, featuring Annette Kellermann, was shown for one week at His Majesty's theater, Guy street, commencing November 9. "S. R. O." business was the rule at all performances. The prices were ten, fifteen and twenty-five cents at all performances.

Mr. Byerle, manager of the local Universal office, is pleased with the results which "The Master Key" is bringing in this territory. It will run serially in the local Herald-Telegraph.

Harry A. Kaufman, the Montreal manager of the Famous Players, reports very good business. The European war is not affecting business, according to Harry. Famous Players and Lasky productions are in big demand by the managers of the larger houses. In the last four weeks the Famous Players' office has taken on twenty new houses in the city of Montreal.

A. Fischer, manager of the local Warner's Features office, is pleased with the results being brought in by the new program. He claims that, although business is not good generally, Warner's has not yet begun to experience any decline in trade. Mr. Fischer was in Toronto recently, and reports good conditions there. The Toronto office is in charge of Mr. Fischer's brother Henry.

The World Film Corporation Montreal office, in charge of Harry Kaufman, assisted by R. S. Bell, is taking on more business every day. The Midway theater has contracted to show Shubert and Brady productions. Mr. Bell was recently in Ottawa on business for the firm.

The Famous Players and Lasky feature productions are going strong at the Imperial, and Mr. Conover, the manager, is greatly pleased with results. The management loaned the theater on November 26 to the Patriotic Fund.

Mr. Hooley, manager of the Theater Francais, is again to the fore with a novel idea. In the lobby is conspicuously placed a large clock, with which is connected a large electric bell. This bell rings four times every hour. Should anyone be in the act of purchasing a ticket when the bell rings, the prospective patron is admitted free of charge. Needless to say, this idea has "caught on" and has been the talk of the town since its inception. Exceptionally good business is being done these days at the big East End house, and Mr. Hooley is always on hand with a good show.

The Equitable Film Exchange has just completed negotiations with the Life Photo Film Corporation, of New York City, to release in Canada all the latter's five-reel features. Mr. Roskam, the manager, gave a trade exhibition of some of these features at the Colonial theater on November 17. The local exhibitors and press were present.

The management of the Tivoli has introduced something new at this popular house. Instead of projecting lantern slides on the screen to tell the story, moving pictures illustrating the song in a novel manner are screened. "The Master Key" and "Zudora" are booked for this house.

Maurice West is not of a pessimistic turn of mind, and consequently is not afraid of hard times. Business at the two houses under his care, the Scala and Family theaters, is bearing up well. Mr. West has booked "Zudora" and "The Master Key" for the Family.

Mr. Tom Cross, manager of the Consolidated Film Company, was recently in New York on business.

Mr. Nicholas, manager of the Strand, announces that he has booked the big Universal serial, "The Master Key." The Strand has contracted with the World Film Corporation to show the Shubert and Brady productions released through that firm.

The Colonial theater recently held a benefit performance in aid of the Belgian Relief Fund.

The Casino management announces that it will show all the great Kleine masterpieces. "Spartacus" was screened for four days, November 15 to 18 inclusive.

The Globe theater, which only recently made its debut in the local field, is now being managed by H. A. Vineberg. Mr. Vineberg is pleased with business done.

The building on St. Lawrence Boulevard, between Milton and Prince Arthur streets, used for a long time by the members of the Greek Orthodox Church as their place of worship, has been converted into a photoplay theater. M. Lacker bought the property from J. Ettenberg for $33,500.

The Daylight Theater Company, Limited, of Saskatoon, has been incorporated under the laws of the Province of Saskatchewan, with a capital of $20,000. GALLAGHER.

PITTSBURGH.

THE Famous Players Film Service, Inc., whose offices at 404 Ferry street, Pittsburgh, were jammed to the limit for the past few months, moved their offices to rooms 309 and 311 Wabash building last week. The shipping and film departments will remain at the old location for the present. The new rooms are spacious, light and pleasing.

Joe Skirboll, formerly manager of the Alco Film Service, Pittsburgh, has been promoted to the position of district manager and will superintend affairs at both the Pittsburgh and Chicago offices of the exchanges. His successor as Pittsburgh manager is J. E. Davis. He had been with the General Film Company for two years, and has lots of experience in the film business and has many friends among the exhibitors.

The Gem theater, 6280 Frankstown avenue, East End, Pittsburgh, conducted by the Kineto Amusement Company for the past two years, was recently purchased by David Mintz, proprietor of the Bijou Dream in the same locality. Mr. Mintz's son, Harry, recently purchased the Evaline theater, and this gives the Mintz family three houses in the radius of a few squares.

The Columbia theater, Turtle Creek, near Pittsburgh, has recently been remodeled and enlarged. The capacity has been increased to over 300 and the new front and other improvements greatly enhance the appearance of the house.

The Pitt theater, Turtle Creek, near Pittsburgh, which was purchased by J. N. Hall three months ago, has been remodeled lately on account of a change in the grade of Penn avenue, on which street the house is located. An entire new front had to be built, and while remodeling was in progress other improvements, including a general brightening up with paint, were made.

The latest serial by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, "The Master Key," which starts immediately after the close of the "Trey o' Hearts," will be handled in Pittsburgh by the Feature Film & Calcium Light Company, and Manager France, of the film department of that concern, is already busy booking the series.

Mr. Allen, formerly of the Pittsburgh branch of the Eclectic Film Company, has been transferred to the same firm's Minneapolis office, where he will be manager.

J. P. Donavan, formerly manager of the Arsenal theater, Pittsburgh, is now manager of the new Regent theater in East Liberty, Pittsburgh, which opened recently. William Kirsch succeeds him as manager of the Arsenal.

In the suit of the Exhibition Feature Film Company against B. S. Leeds, the latter has filed an answer setting up that the company violated its contract with him by substituting "The Rajah's Casket," a film, in place of "Judgment of the Jungles," a film ordered. He asks the suit for $338 be dismissed.

Co-operating with the bureau of commercial economics the university extension department of the University of Pittsburgh is arranging a series of free educational entertainments in which motion pictures designed to give information concerning industries and researches will be exhibited. The reels are supplied for educational purposes only to various schools and colleges. The University of Pittsburgh has received twenty films. Four or five hundred will be shown. The reels are free to high schools, public institutions, lodges and the like, but they are furnished only when those obtaining them provide for the free admission of the public. Along with the moving pictures are lantern slides accompanied with a lecture. These also are for free distribution.

The Star theater at Kane, Pa., has recently been enlarged and improved in appearance. A steam-heating plant has been installed and a new cement floor has been put in and the house has been painted and decorated throughout. The seating capacity is now 350. Brown & Dion are the proprietors.

The new Penn theater, Uniontown, Pa., which is now being erected by the Penn Amusement Company and which will be managed by C. M. McCloskey, proprietor of the Imp theater in the same city, is said to be one of the biggest propositions in the state in the moving picture field. The Penn is in one of the best locations in the town, on Main street. The real estate cost $110,000 and the building $120,000. It is a three-story structure, 50x160 feet, and the theater, which will be devoted exclusively to pictures, will have a capacity of 1,000. It is rapidly nearing completion and the opening date has been set for November 16.

The Peerless theater at Bradford, Pa., has been sold by N. A. Walker to Ike Garfinkle. The house will be remodeled and improved in appearance. MANLEY.

ST. LOUIS.

SCHERER BROTHERS, who operate the Palace theater at 1310 Franklin avenue, have acquired the Mikado, at 5900 Easton avenue. The Mikado theater, which is one of the largest houses in the city, was built three years ago by the O. T. Crawford interests, and was operated with a mixed picture and vaudeville program. The new management have inaugurated an all picture program, featuring the Paramount releases.

The World's Dream theater, at 1413 Market street, is closed while alterations are being made in the building. It is advertised to reopen as soon as improvements are completed.

St. Louis is experimenting a remarkable boom in the theater building line. Five theaters have been built in the last three months, and in addition to these three more are in course of construction. The list of completed houses includes the Lindell, Grand avenue and Hebert street, with 2,000 seating capacity; the Strand, Sixth and St. Charles streets, 500 seats; the Olympia, 1420 Market street, 750 seating capacity; the Duchess, Grand and Washington avenues, 750 seats, and the Powhatton, 7200 Manchester avenue, which seats 1,000 persons. All these houses are of the larger and better class, and all but one charge ten cents admission, and all have picture programs.

The Royal theater, 1529 Market street, has gone back to a picture program after a two weeks' try of vaudeville. Manager John Karzin says his patrons seem to like the pictures best.

Joseph Kuppertz, who has bought the Eclipse Garden at 428 Primm street, has installed a new Edison projecting machine in the theater of the resort.

The World Film Corporation, now in the Navarre building, is getting ready to move its offices in the 3600 block on Olive street, which has become known as "Film Row." With the advent of the World offices, there will be five exchanges in the block, the General, Warner's Features, Alco, World Corporation and the Box Office Attractions.

F. L. Root, who has been operating the Eagle theater, on South Broadway, is building a new theater, which will open November 25.

George Pliakos, owner and manager of the Marquette theater, at 1806 Franklin avenue, has his theater decorated with nine large framed oil paintings. The pictures are real works of art, copies of well known subjects, such as "An Arctic Tragedy," "A Quiet Retreat," "A Near Duel," and others. The Marquette gives four reels of Mutual pictures, features Keystone comedies, and has a four-piece orchestra. Mr. Pliakos also controls the Family theater, at 1440 South Broadway.

The Olympia theater, the new all picture house which was opened at 1420 Market street in October, is under the management of the Olympia Amusement Company, with George Gallanis and Charles Skouras as active managers. The new house maintains a seven-reel mixed program, a four-piece orchestra, and young lady ushers to take care of the 750 patrons the house will accommodate. The theater is equipped with all of the latest ideas in ventilation and air cooling. The projecting room is a model of neatness, and has two six A Powers motor-driven projection machines. Five cents admission is charged and the exhibition is continuous from 10 A. M. to 11 P. M.

Free Bridge Rallies were held in sixty-five moving picture theaters on the night of November 5, which was the eve of the special election held to vote for special bonds to complete the Municipal Bridge across the Mississippi River, which the city has been trying to finish for the last five years. Orators were detailed by the organization working for the Bridge bonds to each theater, and ten minute speeches were made to the audiences between seven and nine o'clock. The proposition to issue the bonds carried by a large majority.

EVERYTHING AGAINST HIM (Nov. 30).—Having struck it rich, John Grant, a miner, journeys to town to raise capital and develop his claim. He meets an old friend, Bill Gould, and their direction being the same, the two men put up at the same hotel, occupy the same room and next morning are seen to leave the hotel together. At a fork in the road, Gould turns off and, unnoticed by either of them, his small prospector's pick falls from his pocket. Grant returns later and finds the pick with the name "Bill Gould" on the handle. Shortly afterwards a track repairer finds Grant's hat, suitcase and papers scattered on the ground, with several blood spots nearby. He notifies the sheriff, who, upon investigation, decides without question, a crime has been committed. Learning Gould was last seen with the "victim," the sheriff decides he is the guilty man. After a week's prospecting, Gould returns to town and is at once arrested. Despite his frantic protests, he is taken to the county jail and there put through a grilling third degree. His explanations are ignored and he is held for trial. Meanwhile Grant returns, and learns to his amazement of the predicament in which his friend has been placed. He rushes off to the jail and almost gives the sheriff and warden heart failure by suddenly confronting them. He at once explains the "crime" by saying he had licked a hobo who was bullying a young lad, a little blood had flowed and when the rest of the gang made a rush for him, he ran, dropping his belongings and Gould's pick, which had been found by the officers beside Grant's belongings. Gould is at once released with apologies and at sight of his old pal, becomes almost hysterical with joy.

SAVED FROM A LIFE OF CRIME (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 1).—Becoming imbued with a lawless spirit, Tom, a street waif, of twelve, holds up an old woman with a toy pistol, robs her of a dollar and gets away. Exhibiting the money to some of his companions, the boy proceeds to give them all an ice cream treat. The feast is interrupted by the police, who nab Tom. He is taken to court charged with highway robbery, and the judge places him on probation. The probation officer sees Tom has the making of a good man in him, should he be placed in the proper environment, and when Mr. Barnes, a wealthy philanthropist, with Helen, as only daughter, expresses a wish to adopt a boy, the officer suggests he interview Tom. The lad makes a very favorable impression on Mr. Barnes, and the latter adopts him. Amidst the surroundings of refinement and wealth, the boy grows up to be a fine young man with an inspiration to become a lawyer. Ten years later, he becomes a very prominent and successful one. He falls in love with Helen, and she with him, but realizing his humble origin, Tom keeps silent. At a Christmas gathering, the girl is wooed by Bonner, a man of wealth and social position but she refuses his proposals of marriage. Tom determines to leave that night, sacrificing himself to gain, as he thinks, Helen's happiness. Just as he is leaving, he discovers that the house has caught fire from a carelessly thrown cigarette, and starting in the Christmas tree, is spreading rapidly. In the ensuing excitement and danger, Bonner proves himself a coward, while Tom, although badly burned, bravely rescues both father and daughter from the burning building, and receives his reward in the complete understanding and love of Helen and her father.

THE MYSTERIOUS MR. DAVY (Dec. 2).—Though recently married Henry Murray pines to satisfy his vanity in a flirtation. He accordingly writes an old friend, Kate Davey, who is not aware of his marriage, makes an appointment and takes her out to dine. To make his absence easier to explain, he pretends to have a male friend, "Mr. Davey," whom he represents to be a lonely "woman-hater." Henry is continually getting messages from "the mysterious Mr. Davey," asking him to dine with him as he feels so blue. Henry at one time refuses to accept, but his wife, whose sympathies have been aroused at the thought of the lonely "Mr. Davey," persuades him to go. So Henry becomes a "martyr" and is soon enjoying himself wining and dining with Katie. Shortly afterwards, Henry's office telephone is out of order, so he sends two letters, one addressed to his wife and the other to Katie. A fatar error occurs when he gets the messages mixed. Katie learns Henry has a wife, while Mrs. Murray becomes suspicious of "Mr. Davey." When he meets Katie at the restaurant, he finds her with a strapping young man, whom she introduces very sweetly as her fiance. That settles it for him and he goes home. His wife quietly shows him the message he sent her by mistake, reading, "Katie, please dine with me tonight, usual place, Henry." He is momentarily flustered, but soon recovers and, taking a pencil, shows her where the "mistake occurred." He crosses out the word Katie and replaces it with the word, "Davey." She is decidedly skeptical, and informs him she will believe the story if he will introduce her to "Mr. Davey." Henry desperately resolves that the only solution is to kill his "friend," so he pays a little visit to the local newspaper office, with the result that next morning his wife reads in the paper of the death of "H. W. Davey, the well-known woman-hater." Imploring his forgiveness for doubting his fathfulness, she caressingly endeavors to soothe him in his "grief" at loss of his friend.

THE MAN THAT MIGHT-HAVE BEEN (Dec. 3).—A profound psychological study of a bereaved father's mind. William Rudd, a mild-mannered shoe clerk in a small country town, loses both wife and new-born son. Crazed with grief, he is only prevented by main force from jumping into the open grave. Without personal ambition himself, he constantly dwells upon what might have been, had his dear ones lived. During his solitary evenings, after a hard day's work in the store he evolves a dream of his departed child, whom he calls Eric, whose growth keeps pace with that of Kittredge, his employer's son. When Kittredge, Junior, cuts new teeth, Rudd imagines his own child is undergoing the same process; when young Kittredge buys his first pair of boy's shoes, the old man dreams he is fitting his sturdy Eric with a brand new pair, and so on; all through the early life of the child. He follows Eric in his career through school, college and politics. On the night of a Presidential election, he dreams Eric reaches the apotheosis of his father's hopes, and achieves the Presidency. As Rudd dreams of the procedure of his son from childhood to manhood, each and every incident is pictured as clearly to our eyes as they are to his mind. All through his vision, his wife always appears as he remembers her, while he himself changes through the years that bring about the metamorphosis of his child. The following morning, when Rudd does not appear at the store, his employer goes to his home and there finds Rudd dead in his chair, a smile of satisfaction overspreading his careworn face.

THE METHODS OF MARGARET (Dec. 4).—A pleasant and easy-going boss, Dick Stanford, is imposed upon by Miss Blake, his flirtatious, gum-chewing stenographer. His wife, Margaret, has very strenuous objections to Miss Blake and her pert ways. The climax comes when Stanford, unexpectedly summoned to Chicago, decides to take his stenographer part way with him to finish some dictation. His wife and he have a quarrel and Dick demands that, since he does not interfere with her servants, she should let him manage his office help. She angrily goes home, dismisses her cook and maid and hires male servants and a secretary. When Stanford returns, he finds a great change in his quiet household. Margaret is busily engaged in going over some papers with her handsome, deferential secretary, while a loud-voiced, blasphemous cook in the kitchen, expresses himself rather forcibly. The other servants prove equally obstreperous when he protests against their impudence. Margaret tells him exactly what he told her when she objected to his stenographer, adding sharply, "Kindly do not interfere with my servants!" After he has vented his rage on the butler, whom he finds smoking his best cigars, Dick begins to realize the fairness of Margaret's stand, and decides to compromise. But Margaret does not wish to compromise, and tells him plainly she intends keeping her servants as long as he keeps Miss Blake. He finally capitulates and discharges his stenographer and hires a man. Margaret, satisfied that her "methods" have proven a complete success, at once hires maids and peace is once more restored in the Stanford family.

BUNNY'S LITTLE BROTHER (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 5).—Naturally fond of the good things of life, Bunny eats heartily and refuses his wife's advice to go on a diet and reduce weight. Bunny's sister-in-law sides with him and Flora peevishly refuses to speak to them. She is greatly impressed by an advertisement stating that Dr. Shrinkum guarantees to reduce weight ten pounds per week. Poor Bunny is forced to go to the sanitarium at once, where he is placed in the "tender" care of a couple of huskies, who proceed to give the patient plenty of exercise. Bunny has some very distressing experiences. He manages to escape one morning and meets his long-lost brother, Joe. Poor Bunny is later captured and brought back to the sanitarium. Meantime, Flora, not hearing from her husband, writes to him. Bunny has been made ill by his strenuous treatment and asks his twin brother to visit Flora and explain matters for him. Joe does so and she mistakes him for John, with ludicrous consequences. Joe takes Flora's sister into his confidence, and they decide to teach Mrs. Bunny a lesson. Joe flies into terrific tempers, nearly scaring Flora to death. She decides the man has gone insane and goes to Doc. Shrinkum for advice. When she speaks of another Bunny and particularly a thin one, the Doc begins to think she is crazy. Then he shows her poor John being slowly sweated to death in the gymnasium. She is overjoyed to see him. On their arrival home they find Joe and Bunny's sister-in-law holding hands. Explanations all around clear up matters and the two couples are soon contented and happy.

WOOD B. WEDD GOES SNIPE HUNTING (12th of Wood B. Wedd Series—Nov. 30).—After his many failures in the matrimonial field in which his friend, Darby Jenks, had managed things for him, Wood B. decided to do a little scheming on his own account, so he started off to the country to find a wife, after writing Jenks, telling him of his intentions, but the note failed to reach Jenks. On arriving at the hotel in Spudville, Wood B. was surprised when he found Darby as the clerk. The enthusiasm of their meeting was soon dampened when their mutual admiration for Susie, the landlord's daughter, became apparent.

Taking his farmer friends into his confidence, Jenks arranged for them to start the subject of snipe hunting, and just as Wood B. became interested, Jenks dropped the information that Susie was very fond of snipe. The bait was taken with a rush, and in a few moments they arranged to take Wood B. out and show him where he could get plenty of snipe. Susie, however, happened to overhear the plan, and, taking pity on the city fellow's ignorance of the time-worn rural joke, she told him all about it, but urged him to fall in with the plan, as she would follow them in a buggy and bring him back to the hotel before the others could return on foot.

Her plan worked splendidly, and the farmers were greatly surprised the following morning to see Wood B. emerge from the hotel, looking as fresh as a daisy, whereas they had spent the entire night on the porch watching for him to return from his snipe hunting expedition. Wood B. was overjoyed, for not only had he outwitted the farmers, but on the ride back from the swamp he had proposed to Susie and she had accepted him.

They started off for the moving picture show, and Wood B. was buying the tickets when, to Susie's horror, what should she discover, but a poster advertising one of Wood B.'s former adventures entitled "Love by the Pound," in which the camera had caught him in the very act of embracing a buxom matron. Outraged, Susie returned his ring to him and once more poor Wood B. had to admit defeat right upon the very threshhold of matrimonial felicity.

A MAID OF WAR (Nov. 30).—While Sweedie is studying her war map in her grog shop, two bums enter the place and start drinking wine. When Sweedie asks them to pay for it they dash out of the place. She calls the police and they pursue the bums. Sweedie is outdistanced in the chase and thought she saw the police enter a certain house, so she rushes in. She discovers her mistake when she sees that she had interrupted a marriage ceremony. All the guests pounce upon her at once, but the bridegroom protects her. The wedding is completely broken up and the bridegroom leaves the place with Sweedie. They proceed to Sweedie's grog shop where they discover that the bums have returned and opened up all the faucets to the wine barrels. She finds them hidden in a corner, so drags them out and a battle royal takes place in wine up to their knees.

THE BUFFER (Dec. 1).—John Harms, a corporation magnate, has two motherless sons, Bobby and Sam. Bobby is a cute little youngster of six, and Sam is of age and spends his father's money with recklessness. Richard Freely, an arch-enemy of Harms', is continually trying to dissolve the corporation, and not until Newton, a half-brother to Freely, has forged some checks on a good friend of Harms', does the financier secure a wedge with which to ruin Freely. Harms threatens to expose his enemy for defending Newton, and Freely is saved from bodily injury by Bobby, who has come to ask his father for candy. Meantime Sam has forged his father's name to a check and handed it to Newton in payment of gambling debts. Harms is about to sacrifice his son to down Freely, when the little "Buffer" again bursts in and drags Sam away to play horse. Harms relents, clasps Freely's hand, and the hatchet is buried forever.

THE FABLE OF THE CLUB GIRLS AND THE FOUR TIMES VETERAN (Dec. 2).—Once a lot of grown-up girls organized a club for the discussion of current evils. The principal current evil they discussed was man. The object was to find some way to keep them home at nights. One dame thought every wife ought to provide her companion with an intellectual atmosphere so he wouldn't sneak out at night to the third parlor. Another suggested dolling up so the flirtatious wretch wouldn't even think of other women. Hattie Jenkins felt sure any husband would stick around home if showered with affections. After the amateurs got through the stern-faced widow, veteran of four trips to the altar, arose and put over some hot ones. "What you dolls don't know about men would fill a library, your theories are a joke. Let me tell you of my matrimonial ventures." She then started in and, oh, how ignorant she did make them feel. She testified that her most popular husband was a R. R. man and was never home. Moral: Absence makes the heart grow accustomed.

SOPHIE'S FATAL WEDDING (Dec. 3).—Slippery Slim receives an invitation to attend the wedding of Sophie and Mustang Pete. He is brokenhearted, and when he goes to Sophie's home to plead with her he is locked out. He leaves a note telling her that he is going to shoot himself, but he loses his nerve. The night of the wedding, all of Sophie's friends arrive with their presents. It is long past the hour for the minister to arrive. Finally her friends all grow impatient, so pack up their presents and go home. Slim has hired a bad man to waylay the minister, and when he sees Mustang going to summon the justice of the peace, he also blocks that move by tacking a sign on the door warning him of smallpox. While Mustang is chasing him, Slim goes in and Sophie is overjoyed at seeing him, and when Mustang returns he is locked out.

BRONCHO BILLY'S JUDGMENT (Dec. 5).—Broncho Billy and his pal are in love with the same girl. They argue one night as to which one she really loves. Broncho suggests that they go to her home and settle the matter. They arrive just in time to see the girl marrying a gambler who is known to be a low-down good-for-nothing by both Broncho and his pal. The two heartbroken suitors decide to leave the country together. One morning Broncho awakes to find a note from his pal saying that he fears the girl living with that man and intends to devote his life to watching over her. Ten years later the gambler is killed in a saloon by an unknown man. Broncho is now sheriff and sets out to find the criminal. He finds his man in the gambler's home, and discovers him to be his old time pal. He tells Broncho that he trailed the victim to the saloon after he had beaten his wife and shot him. Broncho takes off his star rather than arrest his pal for defending their old time sweetheart.

THE PLACE, THE TIME AND THE MAN (Special Two Parts—Dec. 4).—Sylvester Burns, head of the controlling faction of the Pennsylvania Midland Railroad is striving desperately to crush the Spring Creek Railway, a rival line. The Spring Creek line is facing a crisis, as a mountain range bars a connecting line to its main road, which is necessary to through transportation. The most expert engineers are unable to overcome the difficulty.

Alton Stearns, head of the Spring Creek, calls Gardiner Davis, a young engineer who has conquered almost unsurmountable obstacles, as a last resort' Davis and George Burns, son of the railroad magnate, are both in love with Phoebe Stonefield, daughter of the president of the Midland. She spurns George, who is a dissolute character, and tells Davis she hopes he wins success, even though he is working for the road which is the rival of the line of which her father is the head.

The elder Burns fears Davis and hires Jim Spears, a desperate miner, to kill him. Spear switches a hand car on which Davis is riding into an abandoned mine shaft, with the intention of murdering him. Davis, however, grapples with him on the car and they have a terrific hand-to-hand struggle. The car jumps off the track, crashes into the timbers of the tunnel and causes the mouth of the shaft to cave in. Davis then forces Spear, who knows all the passages, to lead him out another entrance. He finds that the passage is just the outlet wanted by the Spring Creek road.

In the meantime Burns, thinking that Davis is dead, starts a raid on Spring Creek. He pounds the stock down almost to the breaking point, when Davis telephones Stearns and tells him of his discovery. A panic is started among Midland holders and the bottom drops out of the stocks. The road then is purchased by Spring Creek and Burns is crushed. Stonefield learns from Burns himself that he had tried to kill Davis, is horrified and breaks with him. Davis then sees to it that he is retained with the new company. Davis and Phoebe plight their troth.

HER BITTER LESSON (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 30).—Evelyn's utter selfishness causes her to disregard her husband's pleas that she ecenomize. His money tied up in a big deal, Dane borrows $1,000 to cope with possible emergencies. This money he places in his safe at home. Evelyn uses the money to meet debts incurred as the result of extravagance. Among the guests at a reception given by Evelyn that evening, is Hughson. The foolish woman engages the man in a violent flirtation. He seizes her in his arms. As Evelyn struggles to free herself, Dane enters. He hurls Hughson from the house.

The realization of Evelyn's selfishness comes to Dane on the following day, when he discovers what has become of the money he had borrowed. As luck would have it, his big deal goes through, netting him a fortune and saving him from possible ruin. Although more prosperous than ever, Dane resolves to teach Evelyn a lesson. The wife is informed that her husband is bankrupt. The two move into a cheap apartment where Evelyn is compelled to do the housework. Dane purposely adopts a harsh attitude and although rebellious, Evelyn secretly admires her husband's firmness.

Her sordid existence wearies the woman, however, and when she accidently meets Hughson, allows the man to take her to lunch. Dane discovers the two in the restaurant. Controlling his rage, the husband keeps his knowledge of Evelyn's conduct secret from her. Evelyn, however, realizes the wrong she has done and when Hughson calls the following afternoon, she orders him to leave. Instead, the man endeavors to make love to her. Fighting furiously, Evelyn finally holds him at bay with a revolver. Dane unexpectedly returns home and takes in the situation. He trounces the intruder. The husband sees that Evelyn has learned her lesson. Taking her in his arms, he confesses his ruse.

THE BELOVED ADVENTURER NO. 12—FATE'S TANGLED THREADS (Nov. 30).—Monte Carson, Betty's self-constituted guardian, has succeeded in convincing the girl that Lord Cecil not only is ashamed of her as his wife, but that he loves another, and she, brokenhearted, has allowed the gambler to take her away. Carson's hope of obtaining possession of the famous Golden Hope has come to nothing, by reason of Betty having, as a proof of her love, left for Cecil a deed of gift to the mine. Carson, nevertheless, determines to make the best of the situation by getting the deluded Betty to a secure and remote place and holding her for ransom. Awaiting a chance to escape from England, he conceals Betty in a mean tavern on the waterfront at Whitehaven. Lord Cecil is in despair over the strange disappearance of his bride, to trace whom all efforts fail. Meanwhile, a commonplace little drama has reached its climax on the Croftlaigh estates. Meg, a simple peasant lass, has listened to the blandishments of a stranger, and shutting her eyes to the love of her sweetheart, Ned Alwine (Cecil's chauffeur), had promised to run away. At the last moment her conscience and fears prove too strong, however, and she refuses to go. The stranger abducts her by force. The girl's old mother appeals to Lord Cecil, demanding, by ancient rite, the protection of the over-lord.

Cecil instinctively responds to this appeal by an hereditary vassal, and sets out in pursuit of the abductor, who has fled in a motor car with his victim. Ned Alwine, frantic with grief and fear for the girl's fate, drives Cecil's machine with furious recklessness. The chase is long and desperate, an unlucky bullet which explodes a tire preventing a capture on the road. The quarry is finally run to earth in Whitehaven and Meg finds safety and forgiveness in the arms of her sweetheart. Cecil is suddenly filled with frantic joy as he sees, from a window overlooking the docks, the lost Betty, just as she and Carson get aboard a motorboat. Before Cecil can reach the pier, however, the motorboat has disappeared in the darkness. Cecil's despair is lightened by the knowledge that at least Betty is living, and as he thinks it will be impossible for her to leave Whitehaven unobserved he has a reasonable hope that he may be able to find her and clear from their lives the cloud that has come over them. Lord Cecil's response to the appeal of his humble vassal has been rewarded.

FOR A WIDOW'S LOVE (Dec. 1).—Both the Judge and the Major are in love with the widow, Daisy Dunne. They fall over each other's feet in the course of courtship, and this leads to a challenge from the Major. The Judge accepts. Dr. Dedham, who also loves the widow, brings her the news, and she is delighted at the thought of being the heroine of a duel, so long as only blank cartridges are used. The Judge and the Major take dramatic farewell of the widow, the effect being somewhat spoiled by the personal clashes between the two, but their alert seconds prevent bloodshed.

In the morning the duel takes place, and after the second shot the Major gets suspicious and examines the guns. He finds them loaded with blanks. The seconds explains and the Judge suggests that they turn the tables on Daisy. A can of red paint is produced and with bandages in the doctor's surgical kit the rivals are turned into two very promising candidates for the undertaker. They come back to town, and on stretchers are brought into the presence of their charmer, who promptly has hysterics and flees from the scene, followed by the doctor, who administers an opiate in the shape of an engagement ring. They go to announce their engagement and the duellists are in high glee over the joke until they see the ring. Then they do not know who the joke is on.

COUPON COLLECTORS (Dec. 1).—Mr. and Mrs. Gink are coupon fiends. They buy all sorts of useless articles in order to get the conpons. The neighbors all have the same craze, and the merchants, taking advantage of this condition, offer double coupons in order to boost trade. The washwomen, street cleaners and blind fiddlers all give coupons, and the local dentist offers four coupons for every tooth pulled. A temperance society install an automatic pump and issues a coupon for every drink of water taken. A tramp falls a victim to this lure and drinks until he is exhausted.

The Ginks store their coupons in a safe in the living room, but a couple of burglars break into the house and, despising the money and jewelry, get away with the coupons. Two policemen arrest them and bring them before the sergeant. The sergeant is a coupon fiend himself, so he decides they have enough coupons to pay thir fine and discharges them, leaving the Gink family to mourn their loss and their inability to obtain some coveted articles at the "coupon redeeming station."

THE HOUSE OF D'OR (Special—Two Parts -Dec. 2).—The father of Sanford D'Or is a plunger, the only man whom John Rockland, the financier, cannot beat in a business deal. Just before D'Or dies he accumulates a fortune and builds the House of D'Or, a country mansion, for his son, Sanford, and Mary, Sanford's fiancee. After the death of D'Or, Rockland sets out to "break" Sanford. He takes from him the House of D'Or and Mary, the girl he loves. Rockland acquires possession on July the first, 1895, and turns to his secretary: "This is a memorial date for me. Let us remember July the first, 1895." Sanford, feeling that this is the crux of his misfortune, remarks to himself: "I shall never forget July the first, 1895."

John Rockland becomes very rich, while Sanford sinks, without, however, losing any of his optimism. Rockland marries Mary, and twenty years later, Barber, a typical socialistic agitator, is harranguing a crowd in the lower section of the city. "A man is a man for a' that," says Burns, and I say "There is not one of us who is not as good as your Rocklands if we would stoop to the same means." In a section of the crowd stands Sanford, now virtually a tramp. An argument is taken up by others in the crowd and a riot results, causing the crowd to be dispersed by the police. Sanford and Barber meet on the outskirts and the argument is taken up again. Barber finally takes Sanford to a fashionable restaurant. They take a seat, but the headwaiter looks at their seedy appearance, refuse to serve them and shows them a line printed on the menu, "The management reserves the right to refuse service to any patron without statement of its reason." Sanford smiles and walks out, but Barber has to be ejected. On the outside John Rockland comes up and taking him for some poor fellow needing a meal, gives him a coin and a card, "Come around and see me and I will give you a job." Resuming their argument Barber claims all millionaires are crooked and he is willing to bet that if he goes to call on Rockland and names any date on a bluff that he has come to demand justice that the millionaire will recollect some crooked deal and will come across. He explains to Sanford, "Name any date at all that you might happen to think of." Sanford laughs. "July first, 1895." When Barber is shown in, Rockland recognizes him. "You have come for a job?" "No! I have come to demand a restitution! Do you remember July first, 1895?" Rockland starts. "Are you D'Or?" Rockland comes across and Barber returns to Sanford and reports; and the worm turns. He becomes progressive. He returns to his father's brokers and Barber, the unscrupulous young fellow, becomes Sanford's willing tool and is sent to the House of D'Or to obtain papers that will help Sanford crush Rockland. Sanford is successful in the stock market. Virginia, the daughter of the capitalist, and Barber fall in love. Sanford completely breaks Rockland, but succeeds in effecting a reconciliation.

THE GRIP OF THE PAST (Special—Two Parts Dec. 3).—Jane and Belle are alone on their dead father's Southern plantation. Jane is the elder of the orphaned sisters. They have been raised with Pedro, a Castillian Spaniard, who was brought to the plantation as a waif and has grown up with the girls as their constant companion. Gradually Jane has grown to love Pedro. Belle, too, has affection for the Spaniard, but remains silent when she learns of Jane's love.

Craven, overseer of the plantation, is an unscrupulous character, who disliked Pedro. By the death of the father the superintendency of the plantation falls (through a mortgage) to Gray, a middle-aged man, and he grows to love Jane. About this time the plantation stables burn through Craven's neglest. During the fire Pedro saves Belle's life. Craven contrives to have Pedro accused of setting fire to the stables. This leads to a fight between the two men. In his fury Craven, in Jane's presence, declares that Pedro is not a Spaniard, but has negro blood in his veins. Pedro pleads with Jane not to believe this. As he embraces her, Jane, overcome by the horror of the thought that Craven's words may be true, shrinks from him.

Pedro, broken-hearted, leaves the plantation. Before his departure he is met by Belle, who, for the first time, openly manifests her love for him. Several years later Gray has married Jane, but the two are gradually drifting apart. Pedro, now a surveyor, is encamped near the plantation. He has with him his faithful negro assistant, Zeb, who has remained loyal to him from the day Pedro left the plantation. Belle has never forgotten her love for Pedro. On the day that Pedro's surveying camp is located near the plantation, Belle finds her father's diary which shows that Pedro was brought to the plantation from a nearby Catholic mission and is a Spaniard—not a negro. Belle breaks the news to Jane the same day. Several hours later

Belle and Pedro meet near the plantation, where Pedro is told the real story of his parentage. The two now openly profess their love and meet daily at a rustic platform built from the edge of a cliff over a deep river. Craven learns of Pedro's presence in the neighborhood and warns Jane's husband, Gray, to watch Jane and Pedro. Gray sees Jane and Pedro in an accidental meeting and sees enough to rouse his suspicions.

Meanwhile Jane realizes that her love for Pedro has reasserted itself. But she knows now that Belle is the recipient of Pedro's affection, and this leads to an unpleasant interview between the two sisters. Belle, determined to wed Pedro, agrees to elope with him. They are to meet at the trysting place overlooking the river. Craven knows that Pedro will be out on the platform at a certain hour, and he tampers with a trap-door so that it will be sprung as soon as Pedro steps upon the platform and precipitate him into the river below. That evening Gray sits awake to watch developments, believing that Jane and Pedro are having clandestine meetings. Belle, ready to elope, creeps from the house to make for the trysting place. Jane secretly follows her. Gray follows both of the women. Zeb has seen Craven tampering with the trap-door and hurries to warn Pedro. Pedro, realizing that Belle will reach the platform ahead of him, runs frantically to intercept her. On the way he meets the jealous Gray. The men fight and Gray is knocked out. Pedro, arriving breathless at the river platform, is about to be fired upon by Craven from ambush, but Zeb intercepts in time to save his life. The two men engage in death grapple. Belle has proceeded to the platform, ignorant of the fate that awaits her, but is saved in the nick of time by Pedro. In the struggle between Pedro and Craven, the latter is forced out upon the platform and he plunges through the trap-door to the river hundreds of feet below. He is drowned. Explanations convince Gray of Jane's innocence and husband and wife are reconciled while Belle and Pedro depart to be married.

A BELIEVER IN DREAMS (Dec. 4).—Helen is a wealthy society bud who, with her mother, goes to a reception to hear a famous singer—Bruce McCarroll. She is in the conservatory waiting for her admirer, Philip, to bring her her fan while Bruce is singing. She becomes fascinated and infatuated with the singer and his voice. Philip returns, cannot resist her charms and takes her in his arms. Bruce has finished his song and, with his arms full of roses showered upon him by the guests, enters the conservatory in time to see Helen struggling in Philip's arms. He parts them. Helen sends Philip on his way unforgiven and turns to face Bruce. He gives her his flowers and gallantly kisses her hand and leaves.

Helen's heart is much disturbed, and that evening, alone in her room awaiting her maid, she drops off into a doze and imagines herself back in the swashbuckling age in a garden full of masked revelers. A troubadour, also masked is singing and making a great hit especially with Helen. Helen is seized by one of the masked men and is struggling against his kisses when the troubadour saves her and the other man leaves. As did Bruce in the conservatory this troubadour fills her arms with flowers and she awakens as he is kissing her hand. Feeling sure that the dream portends Bruce, she writes him to call. He does and, as did the troubadour, plays a guitar and sings a love song to her. She is half hypnotized into a greater infatuation for him when Philip calls again to beg forgiveness. Helen refuses forgiveness and sends him away. Bruce seizes his opportunity and she is engaged before she realizes it.

On her marriage day Bruce is trying his best to get rid of an old flame, one of the many he has affairs with, and is therefore delayed. Helen is overcome by the heat and odors from the flowers and is promptly transported back (dissolve as before) to the garden and the scene where she left off. When the troubadour raises his head from her hand she begs him to unmask and behold it is Philip, not Bruce. Bruce is seen to be the other man when he unmasks in another spot of the garden and Helen willingly yields herself to Philip's arms. She comes to herself feeling his kisses on her lips as Bruce enters and is greeted by the assembled folks. Helen, dazed, realized that she is about to marry the wrong man and in a fit of hysterics refuses to have anything more to do with him and shows him the door. Bruce smiles sneeringly and exits. Then she phones to Philip. He comes at her bidding, is asked to tell her all over again that he still loves her and forgives her treatment of him and is proclaimed before them all as the man she wants to marry. Philip is not slow in seizing his opportunity and the scene fades away with the ceremony.

BROWN'S COOK (Dec. 5). Bob Johnson runs down to the city to look after some business, and his friend Judson Brown, invites him to dinner and to meet the new Mrs. Brown. Brown has a capital cook, and Bob enjoys the dinner. When he gets home and finds their own cook gone, he gets the foolish idea of hiring a gunman to kidnap Brown's cook; but the Brown's cook quits then and it is Mrs. Brown that the toughs capture Jealous, Brown jumps to the conclusion Bob meant Mrs. Brown, though he wrote the toughs it was the cook. Bob meets the kidnappers on the street and is astonished to find Mrs. Brown instead of the cook, but he takes her to his house. Brown pursues and shoots after them. Inside Bob's house Mrs. Johnson bombards them with plates and furniture. Bob takes Mrs. Brown to the back porch, but comes right in again when Brown shoots at him. He manages to explain to his wife, but Brown comes in and does some more shooting. A general row ensues, but the two men reach an understanding and trouble is averted.

HE WANTED HIS PANTS (Dec. 5).—James Jimson gets in a poker game and brings home a couple of hundred. His snores wake his wife early and she finds the money. She also finds a hole in the trousers and takes them downstairs to mend. She lacks the proper thread and runs over to a neighbor for it. Jimson wakes and can find neither wife nor pants. Being of an excitable temperament he jumps at the conclusion that his wife and the money have both been stolen. Clad in a frock coat, silk hat and a table cover, he enlists the aid of a couple of policeman, imploring them to find his money and his wife, but to find the money first. They find both at the same time, but when Mrs. Jimson declares that she has not the money, they decide to search her. Jimson interferes, knowing that the money is probably in her stocking. He talks her out of it and tips the policemen, who go away. Mrs. Jimson reaches for her spouse, but he calls the policemen back and sails away like an ocean liner convoyed by cruisers.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 72 (Nov. 5).—How the European war has made millions of women and children homeless is vividly portrayed. Other interesting parts of the war section are a batch of German prisoners being led away by Belgian soldiers; King Edward's Regiment of Horse leaving London for the front, and English raw recruits being drilled at Aldershot.

The mine disaster at Royalton, Ill., in which fifty men were killed was the most striking of the domestic topics. The scenes were all made the day after the explosion occurred and while the bodies were still being brought to the surface. There is also an excellent picture of the new military aeroplane designed and built by Glenn Martin, being tried out at San Diego, Cal. An interesting novelty is the picture of the girl messengers on roller skates.

Two Big ITALA Serials Coming

Tigris

Maciste

Answering the insistent call of universal demand, a wonderful character will not be suffered to die. Tigris the Terrible, than whom in film history there is none greater, returns, the Super-Criminal, in a series of exploits extraordinary. To the many millions who witnessed his deeds of daring in the first "Tigris" no motion picture announcement could hold more promise. As "Cabiria" surpassed all other spectacles so will this transcend in power and plot and superb staging all serials filmed before.

"Maciste," the modern Apollo, whose colossal proportions make ordinary folk seem as pygmies, rightly earned in "Cabiria" the title of "the most talked about character in fictional filmdom." Round this character has been written tales of adventure, deeds accomplishable only by one whose daring dauntlessness is backed by strength immeasurable. Into imagination's depths one can go in finding tasks befitting this 20th Century Hercules. Each episode complete in itself—an entertainment entire.

UNREST (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 30).—Tom Dean is a mystery to his father, who has engaged Prof. Delmar, an eminent psychological scientist, to give Tom a course of special treatment. Tom has a comfortable, handsomely furnished apartment in his father's house, yet he prefers the company of Bowery toughs, and in order to be in this questionable company, rents a room in the tenement house district.

Prof. Delmar holds the belief that Tom is atavistic and that he is not living in the present age. Silas Dean has given Prof. Delmar carte blanche to find a cure for Tom and restore him to a normal condition. The Professor plots and schemes.

Prof. Delmar is unremitting in his attempts to keep Tom out of the Bowery saloons and away from the toughs, and while Tom does not drink to excess he ois influenced by those with whom he consorts. One day the Professor finds Tom in a Bowery groggery and persuades him to go home. On the way they see a charming girl dash by in a racing automobile. Tom shows particular interest in her, whereupon the Professor resolves upon an entirely new scheme.

Tom is treated with the greatest of kindness by his father under all circumstances, and he is given to understand that he will be supplied with such funds as he desires, the only request being that he shall live at home and keep away from the Bowery.

One day Mrs. Morgan and her daughter call at the Dean residence and invite Silas Dean, the Professor and Tom to go for an automobile ride. While driving through the city they are attracted by a crowd which blocks the street. The automobile proceeds slowly until they come within sight of a gang of Bowery toughs engaged in a street fight with a detachment of police. The ladies in the party are horrified, but are compelled to remain in the jam of vehicles, but Tom, impelled by that strange spirit which controls him, springs from the automobile, battles his way through the crowd until he joins the gang of toughs, and then helps them to defeat the police.

Pref. Delmar, realizing that Tom is attracted by a racing automobile, influences the beautiful society girl whom Tom viewed with interest, one day, when passing in her racing machine, to help him with his "treatment" of the erring young man. She engages in a spirited automobile race with Tom one day, defeats him and leaves him standing by his wrecked machine. For the first time in his life Tom Dean shows an interest in a member of the gentler sex.

Again Tom is governed by his feelings of unrest and consorts with his friends in the Bowery gang. He learns that Gregg, who claims the title of champion pugilist of the Bowery, spreads the report that Tom has left his haunts because of his fear of Gregg. This makes Tom angry. Accompanied by some of his rough acquaintances, he finds Gregg in a saloon, demands whether Gregg has spread such a report, and upon receiving a reply in the affirmative knocks him down.

Both contestants fight furiously, but Tom finally gives the "knock-out" blow to Gregg just as the police burst in the door. Tom's friends, elated with the success of their champion, help him to elude the police and escape. The police are aware of his identity, but the prominence of Silas Dean causes the chief of police to visit his home and place the case before Tom's father. Tom is deeply penitent, but gives the excuse that a point of honor was involved and that it was not merely a bar-room brawl. He again leaves home.

In the meantime, Prof. Delmar has not lost sight of Tom. Bess Garwood, the society girl who defeated Tom in the automobile race, has been impelled by a spirit of fun to follow the suggestions of the Professor, and she locates Tom under an assumed name at the seashore, engaged as a boatman. She involves him in a harmless flirtation and manages to excite his interest, but this requires some time and much skillful maneuvering. Bessie caps the climax by pretending that she is drowning in the surf, one afternoon, while Tom is out in his moat. She calls for help and he plunges into the water after her. He believes that he is rescuing a girl from drowning, but she, being an expert swimmer, is merely fooling him. Tom carries her limp body through the surf and up the beach and lays her down on the sands. Then when he exercises his skill and knowledge to resuscitate her, she springs up with a laugh and mocks him. Their acquaintance quickly ripens into love, and Silas Dean one day receives the welcome intelligence that Tom's atavistic tendencies have been cured. He brings Bessie home as his bride.

THE WISE GUYS (Dec. 2).—Father and son both are in love with the same girl, but neither knows the other is his rival. Father buys flowers and takes them to the girl, then asks her to marry him. She consents and he produces a beautiful diamond ring. He leaves, telling her he will be back in the evening. Son follows suit and she accepts him. Both are jubiliant and tell the other how happy they are going to be. Son gets away first to the girl's apartment and is fondly caressing her when a rap at the door warns her. She hurries the son into the closet and father comes to enjoy a few moments of real love making. But another knock and father, too, is huried into the dark closet. A man enters—who can it be, but her husband. And while father and son battle for love's sake in the closet, husband is shown the beautiful stones his wife has worked from the two boobs. Son proves the stronger and escapes from the closet only to confront the angry husband, who tells him who he is and drives him from the house. Father follows just in time to leap into son's machine, where they discover the treachery of each other and let the girl and husband escape to another town.

THE DREAM OF A PAINTING (Dec. 5).—Henry Peck visits the art gallery with his wife, much against his wishes, that is until he sees the painting of the beautiful Princess De Egyptienne. Wife, indignant, drags him away, but he steals back later and plants himself in a comfortable chair right before the divine Princess.

Suddenly the Princess shows signs of life and steps down out of the frame. She embraces Peck, who immediately falls in love. Then come thoughts of his wife. She must never know the truth. At that fearful thought he dashes out, but the Princess follows, even into his own house, where she continues her demonstration of ardent love.

Peck and the butler disguise the Princess when wife is seen returning home, and the Princess is introduced as the new cook.

Trouble starts. The Princess does not take kindly to her new job and throws it up. A violent dispute ensues between Peck and wife. The Princess comes to Peck's aid with a drawn dagger. The wife flees in terror. At once Peck protests against the Princess' actions toward his wife, and in a fit of jealous fury, she bores her dagger into his ribs.

At that point Peck wakes up, for it was a dream, to find that wifie is poking the point of her parasol into his ribs.

ECLAIR.

THE WONDROUS MELODY (Two Parts—Nov. 18).—Yvonne is the daughter of Andre, an old violinist. Against her father's wishes she accepts the attentions of Jean, a "no-account," and is soon in love with him. They elope, leaving the old man alone.

Jean obtains employment as the leader of an orchestra. After a time a little boy comes to his home. But this does not seem to cause the husband to cease his evil ways. His gambling and drinking make Yvonne's life one of poverty and want. Back in the Canadian town a prize of $500 is offered to the composer and performer of the finest violin solo. The old violinist works to obtain this reward.

Time comes when Yvonne is deserted. She discovers that her son has inherited his father's musical ability. Reading of the contest she determines to have the child enter it. She travels from town to town singing while the child plays the violin. She accumulates enough money to bring them home. Poverty has also touched the old man, who is now living in a cheap hotel. Yvonne, with her son, takes a room in the same hotel, directly underneath that of her father. The father is not aware of their presence.

One night the little boy, wrapped in his dreams, is suddenly awakened by the wonderful strains of a violin coming from above. He believes it to be the answer to his prayers. He absorbs the wondrous melody with the idea of playing it when the contest takes place.

The day of the contest arrives. Being the youngest competitor, the little fellow, with his golden hair, is invited to play first. The old man comes to the hall, and his heart is chilled as he listens to his own melody being played. As the child finishes, the audience applauds mightily. The boy is told to return later to receive the reward.

As the child is being led down the aisle by his fond mother he sees the old man standing at the rear of the audience, tears coursing down his cheeks. Then the girl observes.

A touching reconciliation follows, after explanations, and the happy little family wends its way homeward.

THE HIGHER IMPULSE (Dec. 6).—John Brent, a drunken loafer, neglects his wife and child until they are finally evicted from their poverty-stricken home.

When Brent returns that night and mistreats his wife, she decides it is time to cut loose and shift for herself and child. Wandering aimlessly about, the homeless woman and child are taken in by a good woman in another part of the city, whose son secures for Clara, the little girl, a job selling newspapers.

Meanwhile Brent has gone from bad to worse and in an attempt to snatch a pocketbook he is stopped by a Salvation Army officer, who takes him in charge and prevents the theft. He takes him to the home and after a long and hard struggle Brent is reformed and becomes a God-fearing and law-abiding citizen. He is placed in a job as a street cleaner. In the course of his duties one day he stumbles upon a pocketbook containing money and a minister's card, with the address written on it. Unknown to him his wife the day before had stumbled and fell at this very spot and dropped her pocketbook containing a few pennies. Brent inquiries at the minister's house and is amazed to learn that the minister has been befriending his wife and child who are living nearby in happiness and comfort.

To atone for the past and to prove to his wife he is a new man, he goes to the home where they are staying and after tearful explanations a happy reconciliation takes place.

Slowboy enters, she refuses to notice him, telling him she will have nothing more to do with him, as she is engaged to the boss. After a time the boss tells Vivian he was only fooling. A BARBER SHOP FEUD (Dec. 1). Tony and Angelo, tonsorial experts, are rivals for the hand of Myrtle, the pretty manicurist. In their eager race to win the affections of this young lady, they annoy exceedingly the customers of the shop, for love-making and shaving do not go well together, and a well-lathered brush carelessly jabbed in the eye of an irate old gentleman is not calculated to soothe his feelings.

Outside of business hours their jealousy knows no bounds. Myrtle goes to the picture shows and accepts floral tokens from both the barbers without showing discrimination. August, a young gentleman of means who possesses an auto steps in and holds the stage for a while. Angelo succeeds in putting Tony in wrong with the boss and has him fired. Tony vows revenge after the manner of the Camorra. He pours a liberal amount of white enamel into the shaving mug. August and the boss are both lathered with white enamel "shaving soap" and both discover at the same time a razor and vigorous rubbing will not remove it from their faces. Angelo is blamed and a general mix-up follows in which the barber shop is wrecked and everyone, including the innocent Myrtle, is covered with the paint. Tony enjoys his revenge from outside. When Angelo is fired and August driven off Tony steps in, straightens out the shop, secures his old position and wins the hand of Myrtle.

WHEN LIZZIE GOT HER POLISH (Nov. 20).—Lizzie is the daughter of a Western ranch owner and an all-around good fellow with the cowboys. She is hampered by none of the conventions of society and her hoyden-ish tendencies have been allowed to run riot. Her father receives a letter from her rich uncle stating he desires to make Lizzie his heir, and, knowing Lizzie lacks the polish necessary and in keeping with her future position in life, he encloses a large check, sufficient to take her through a fashionable boarding school in the East.

Lizzie is in love with Jim, one of her father's cowboys. After a tender leave-taking, she departs. Her wild Western ideas and methods cause consternation among the fashionable Eastern girls of the school and she is the butt of many jibes and practical jokes. Her sheer pluck bears her safely through, and when, with her lasso and revolver she captures two dangerous crooks who invade the girl's dormitory, she wholly redeems herself in the eyes of the girls. They become her ardent friends and admirers.

When her polish has been acquired, she returns to her father's ranch, where she meets her faithful cowboy lover and he learns of her unswerving devotion.

HIS UNCLE'S WILL (Two Parts—Nov. 19).—Upon his return from Europe, Arthur Stephens, through his secretary, learns the terms of his recently deceased uncle's will. He is to be disherited in case he refuses to comply with one condition—he should marry the daughter of an old friend of his uncle's. This young woman he has never seen. The same day, while out driving in his machine, Stephens makes the acquaintance of a charming country girl and his heart tells him he has, at last, found the girl of his choice. Returning home, he informs his secretary he cannot hear of his uncle's preposterous demand, and sets out to secure employment.

The lawyer, who is acting as executor of the will, receives an answer to his communication addressed to the girl in question, in the form of a little unsophisticated country girl. Not being able to locate Stephens, and not knowing what to do with the girl in the absence of her future husband, he gives her a letter of introduction to the matron of a certain young lady's school. She is admitted and cared for.

Answering an advertisement, Stephens secures the position of chauffeur to the matron of this same school. He meets, for the second time, the little country girl. He wins her love, and after many narrow escapes, the young people succeed in eloping. All ends happily when he finds that he has unwittingly fulfilled the condition continued in his uncle's will.

THE MYSTERY OF SEA VIEW HOTEL (Two Parts—Dec. 3).—What is the mystery of the perfumed handkerchief? In spite of every precaution taken by the Sea View Hotel management, robberies persist among the guests; and after each robbery a delicate handkerchief, strangely perfumed, remains behind as a baffling clue. Occasionally there are cigar butts of some special manufacture left behind, and on other occasions ladies' gloves, men's ties, etc., but it is the perfumed handkerchiefs which create the stir and wonderment among guests and detectives. When their own efforts have failed to detect the criminal, Ben Wilson, amateur detective and friend of the manager, is called and he takes up the task of clearing up the mystery and bringing the criminal to justice. When Ben takes up the case of the Sea View Hotel, he is particularly struck with the mystery of the various handkerchiefs each perfumed with the same distinctive odor. The proprietor of the hotel suspects a certain young lady guests, though he has no direct proof of her guilt. However, she is pointed out and introduced to Ben. He begins immediately to cultivate her friendship. But in his pursuit of clues he finds that the trails lead in many directions. He suspects not only every one of the guests who acts out of the ordinary, but is led finally to mistrust his friend the proprietor. Later, he is approached twice, when off his guard, by a queer character dressed in a monk's robe and cowl and fully masked. On the first visit the figure wears a pair of woman's dancing shoes; during the second, it wears man's shoes. These visits are made to him in his own rooms at night by someone capable of easy ingress and egress, and are in the nature of warning.

Having made a close study of the monk's foot wear, Ben is led to associate them with, and believes them to belong to the young woman guest under suspicion and to her friend, a gentleman of the hotel who appears constantly with her. But he runs his clues to the earth without satisfying results. He is pondering the question of whether or not his friend can be the thief, when an attack is made upon his life. For the moment it settles all doubt in his mind. He decides to quit the hotel.

On second thought, however, he resolves to go to the bottom of the mystery. It is a matter of personal satisfaction. Securing the services of a female detective, Ben returns to the hotel under disguise with her. Ben prepares a trap. It is in the nature of a fake diamond necklace which is featured, the first evening, around the female detective's fair neck. That night the thief takes the bait and the trap is sprung. However, who the thief is remains, for the time being, a mystery until unmasked before your eyes. Incidentally he proves to be a victim of kleptomania.

THE LION, THE LAMB AND THE MAN (Two Parts—Dec. 6).—Agnes Duane, a young woman of the twentieth century, full of good red blood and with plenty of spirit, returns to her New England home and its prim atmosphere, after completing her course in college. Arriving there, she finds that her considerate parents have chosen for her a husband. The individual whom they have chosen for this honor happens to be en effiminate, insipid, very sanctimonious little minister. Upon meeting him Agnes laughs in his face, much to the humiliation of the minister and the consternation of her strait-laced parents.

Thinking to cure her of some of her crudeness, her father sends her to his brother down in Kentucky, where she roams the mountain fastness in untrammeled freedom. One day while wandering about in the hills she becomes lost and is found and taken to her uncle's home by one of a queer duo of mountaineer brothers who harbor an inborn and intense hatred for each other. One of these men is a veritable giant in size and strength while the other—the one who rescued Agnes—is of small build and slight strength, but is possessed of a superior cunning.

Soon she becomes acquainted with both these brothers and both fall deeply in love with her. Finally, one night the younger and smaller brother, tries to force himself upon her and he is confronted by the giant. In a dissolve the reason for this hate is revealed. As a result of this encounter the weaker man devises a diabolical scheme to put his brother out of the way. Fortunately for the giant, the scheme fails and he passes the trap unscathed. In the meantime, Agnes has felt herself drawn to the larger man by his sheer animal magnetism. She seems on the point of confessing her love for him when, through a cruel act, his true nature is revealed and she turns from him. Soon after she meets the Rev. Hugh Baxton, a real man at last, and to him she surrenders unconditionally.

THE TREASURE TRAIN (Two Parts Nov. 16).—Armstrong is the superintendent of the railroad. He receives word that the girl operator at Lone Pine is to be discharged to make way for a man with influence. Armstrong has reasons to resent this. He goes to the office to submit these reasons to the board of directors. He tells how, five years before, he made his way to this little station as a tramp to seek shelter; how thugs attacked the station-master and himself, bound, gagged them and prepared to wreck a train that had passengers and gold aboard. He tells them how he managed to telegraph with his foot for aid; how the same girl, who had taken her sick father's place in the neighboring station, received his call over the wire and managed to get to the wayside cross road in time to flag the train; how the tramps were arrested, and later he (Armstrong) was given a good job.

Armstrong's story convinces the directors. They agree with him that the girl should not be discharged. The superintendent tells them that it is immaterial to him whether the girl works or not, as he expects to marry her. Armstrong simply could not see injustice done, even though its effect would be nil. Later we see the young lovers together happily married.

THE YOUNG PHILANTHROPIST (Dec. 3).—Matty, while on a visit to the slums, sees a sickly infant. Thinking the child insufficiently nourished, he takes it from the arms of the little sister and brings it to the Nathan Straus Pastuerized Milk Department. In the meantime the little girl runs home and tells her mother of this. The mother rushes from her miserable rooms, where her husband is sick in bed and where the other little children are making flowers, and, going to the milk station, demands her child. The nurses show the benefit of the sanitary feeding and how much the child is improved. Matty, however, is not satisfied with this, and goes to the millionaire owner of the tenement house and asks him to do something for the poor family. The man ridicules him as an officious child. Undaunted, Matty goes to the wife of the owner, who sends the poor family to the country where the husband recuperates and then gets him a good job.

POWERS.

THE HEART OF A MAGDALENE (Two Parts Dec. 4).—A prize of $10,000 is offered by Bishop Conroy for a picture of the Madonna. Among the artists who decide to compete is young Leon Hewitt. Marie Horton, a wealthy young woman, has taken a fancy to the young artist. She offers to be his model in the picture. One night Leon, in a rage wipes out every vestige of his work. Thompson, an artist friend, and another student, drag him out to a cafe.

Drinking with the gay crowd Hewitt suddenly observes a woman. He declares her to be the ideal model for his picture. Thompson tells him that the woman is the notorious Mlle. Clarine Caldee. It makes no difference. Thompson at last laughingly volunteers to introduce him. They go to the table and Leon meets the woman. When Leon makes his suggestion that she pose as a Madonna for him, her crowd shouts with laughter. Her lover lifts his glass high and offers a toast to Mlle. as a Madonna. Annoyed and spiteful, she accepts Leon's offer. The next day she arrives in a "simple" dress, lace and ruffles. Leon gives her a painting apron and tells her to change quickly and let her hair down. Though annoyed she does as she is told. He has borrowed the landlady's baby and puts it in Clarine's arms. She is startled. But later, when the baby is asleep, she lefts the little hand curiously and holds it to her cheek.

Later Leon bids her rest. They are drinking with the baby sitting on Clarine's knee when Marie comes in. She is angry. When Leon insists that he needs the model, Marie breaks their engagement. The weeks go by. The baby and the man's kindness have changed Clarine. She has learned to love him devotedly. To him she is the model, nothing more.

The picture is finished and it wins the prize. Leon gives a fete. Clarine is not invited. Hurt by this neglect and angry that she is to have no part in honoring a picture which could not have been made but for her, she determines to ruin it. She slips to the studio in time to watch the guests depart. Marie has returned to Leon and now that he is successful, again offers her love. He accepts, but there is little heart in it. Clarine stands before the picture in the empty studio a sharp knife in her hand. She raises to strike,, but something stops her; she cannot hurt this picture—it is herself; in the mirror she sees her own face. It is the same face as that of the Madonna, the face of a good woman.

The knife clatters to the floor. She stands, head bowed, as Leon enters the room. He is angry. She clings to him and pleads. He says she must go. "You have made me the good woman of that picture. Would you send me back to the old life again?"

Leon hesitates. Then he turns to the picture. Then he looks down at Clarine kneeling at his feet. He realizes what she means to him and how empty was the gay fete just past without her. He lifts her and takes her in his arms.

NINETY BLACK BOXES (Two Parts—Nov. 21).—King Louis XI. of France is beset with the idea that his uncle, the aged King Rene, is trafficking with England and Burgandy against the French throne. So well has Francois Villon served his royal master that Louis sends him to Rene's court, there to either realize or set at rest the suspicion. The poet-ambassador obeys the will of Louis and soon convinces himself that the French king's suspicion is unwarranted. His diplomatic business being at an end, Villon lingers to enjoy himself at Rene's court.

Guests of King Rene are the Duke and the Duchess De Breuil. The young Duchess, charmed with Villon's poetry, draws the susceptible poet into a mild flirtation. Her husband, the Duke, discovers Villon and the Duchess in the garden. The Duke his anger getting the better of his good judgment, insults Villon and hurls his gage at the feet of the poet. The action takes place before King Rene, who, while regretting that the quarrel has been forced upon Villon, tells the poet that the lists are at his service. Villon is no fighter, nor is he a coward; he prefers a battle of wits rather than a battle with swords. To save his face, Villon picks up the Duke's glove and with it lightly assaults its owner, then claims protection on the plea that a vow prevents his indulging in an assault at arms. To further fortify himself against such a possibility the poet requests that the king set him some knightly task, that life may be saved. The request pleases the aged monarch. Thought immediately comes to him concerning one John Ballue, a man of great cruelty, of whom it is known that his prisoners, having once gotten into his clutches, never escape, each prisoner being confined in a narrow box, to which there are no keys. The King informs Villon that he, accompanied by the Duke De Breuil, shall go to Anjou and pit themselves against John Ballue. The Duke, knowing the history of Ballue, refuses. Villon sneers at the Duke, then accepts the King's mission.

We next find Villon at the palce of John Ballue, measuring his wits against those of the jailer. Villon wins the mental battle, succeeds in shutting Ballue into one of his own boxes and liberates the prisoners. Enroute to Rene's court, Villon is foolish enough to offer Ballue an opportunity to fight for his life. Once out of the box the crafty prisoner makes good his escape. Humiliated and fearing the wrath of Rene and the ridicule of Louis XI, Villon bids the released prisoners go their various way then seeks out the camp of his vagabond friends. Here we leave him, though not for long, for it is known that the French king, after three years, sought him out and raised him to a dignity greater than that which he enjoyed prior to his return into Vagabondia.

FONDLING OF FATHER TIME (Two Parts—Dec. 5).—He was a kind old person, and he had served his employers well. In fact, he devoted forty years of his life; gave his brains and talent toward making the firm a success. But then a man can't always go on giving the energy and fresh ideas of youth and the firm knew it. The old man served his time with a beggar's reward and the best he got was a notice one day that his services were no longer required. It was late in the evening when the old man returned to his poorly-furnished little home; how could he tell his wife, was the question which kepts his heart pounding against his withered old breast. But he did tell her, and the mothering heart in her warmed. She was his best friend, his pal for many years, and to fail her "man" now; well, she was not that kind.

Of course the old man tried to secure another position; he needed it; his savings would not keep them more than a week or so. But it was a vain search. We follow him, step by step, in his declining path, until we see him without home, friends, and even shelter. And having suffered eviction, he leads his wife into a public square, where 'neath a pouring rain, they drop exhausted on a bench. For a time no one notices the old couple huddled on the bench. Then a policeman comes upon them. He approaches and speaks. There is no response. He attempts to awaken the apparent sleepers only to find that their souls have passed to the Great Beyond. And as the picture closes the astral bodies of the faithful couple ascend Heavenward, where they are received by the Angels of Light into their haven of eternal peace.

FOR THE PEOPLE (Two Parts—Nov. 20).—As a prologue to the story you are shown a big landslide, an accident in a gravel pit, as a result of which a workman is killed. You are shown how, under the old insurance law, his family was abused and cheated out of the money justly due them. Following, you are introduced to a young lawyer-politician, a man of the people, who is achieving power and popularity through his progressive methods and beliefs. He is in love with the daughter of one of the big politicial bosses who is, incidentally, a wealthy, grafting contractor. The boss objects to the young man as a suitor, principally because he fears him in a political way. He fights him bitterly at every turn. When this fails, the boss approaches the young lawyer and seeks to bribe him over to his way of thinking. It is only the appearance of his daughter which keeps him from being thrown from the house.

At this point the big boss plays his trump; he forges his daughter's name to a letter which informs the young lawyer that he cannot hope to win the girl, believing, as he does, and fighting her father. The young lawyer sees himself standing between the necessity of choosing between his sweetheart and his beliefs; he decides, after a mental struggle, to pursue the line of duty marked out for him. He will fight for the people. He is elected Senator. The day comes when he must deliver his final appeal in the senate chamber to have the Workmen's Compensation Bill made law. He delivers his address; the girl is there to hear him. A vote is taken. The bill is passed.

Prior to this the young senator had visited Governor Cox to secure his support and advice in advancing the cause of the bill. After the bill is passed it comes before the Governor for his signature, the last thing needed to make it law. Several States would like the same.

Later, the young senator discovers the letter from his sweetheart to be a forgery. Explanations are made and a reconciliation is brought about, while the old father is forced to consent. You see, then, the practical effects of the compensation law when applied.

A LONELY SALVATION (Two Parts—Nov. 30). Here is a story in which one blow is dealt, killing two hearts. The woman is a woman from the depths, but withal a woman. One with all the instincts of love undeveloped, one with a heart steeled to commit crimes, a woman who has the primitive instincts only. Even her name, "Steve," is suggestive of the undeveloped womanhood. She is but a thief, one of a gang, really a daughter of an old crook. He orders her to loot the home of rich John Stonleigh. Armed with the combination of the safe which her father has smuggled from Stonleigh's butler, she enters the household and proceeds with her nefarious work.

Stonleigh discovers that a theft is about to be perpetrated, and whistles for the police, who rush to the mansion. As Stonleigh realizes that the thief is a girl, with large soulful eyes, he obeys an impulse. Instead of giving her over to the police, he hides her in an adjoining room. When the police leave, the girl and the man have a heart-to-heart talk. The man, against all traditions, finds that he is wonderfully interested in this little unkempt girl. As for the girl; this handsome, kind-hearted man appeals to her and for the first time in her life, she is ashamed of her rags. She hears as one in a dream the kind suggestion being made by John Stonleigh.

She agrees and leaves, the man remaining in a brown study, unable to fathom the psychological problem which confronts him. When the girl reaches the west, she resolves that henceforth her life will be one of honesty. A correspondence is developed and soon Stonleigh realizes that he loves the girl.

How often "Steve" is tempted to resort to her old tactics—to steal! Would the hideous instinct ever desert her? Then a vision of her John would appear and she would hate herself for harboring such thoughts. It meant a fight. A fight for her freedom of soul and—she won.

But—suddenly his letters did not come, and try as she might, she could not help believing that her lover had changed. Perhaps he has met another. Then she decides that she cannot bear the suspense and asking for leave, she departs for New York. Once again she is in the garden of John Stonleigh. Peeping in through the window she is horrified to behold a sight which freezes the very blood in her arms. There are flowers everywhere and entering she finds why John has not written. John is dead.

So an unkind fate wrecks the life of a woman. "Steve" resolves to remain true to her lover's memory and, alone in her room, she vows that her fight is won.

PAPA BUYS A BALE (Dec. 4).—Papa despises Reggie, but Elsie likes him. Papa sets the bull dog on him and Reggie, in revenge, adds two naughts to Papa's order for one ball of cotton. Then the order reads 100 bales. Papa waxes furious and hurls the bales from the window. They fall on Reggie. The villagers arrive and tell the irate parent that, owing to his public spiritedness in buying one hundred bales they have decided to nominate him for Congress.

Horatio Hamfatter and Boccaccio Barnstorm read of the great love Papa holds for all Southerners. They disguise themselves as Southerners and tell him that he must board them for the winter. Then a merry war ensues, in which bales of cotton are hurled about. Reggie comes to the rescue and throws the impostors through the window. He gets the girl.

GOLD SEAL

CALLED BACK (Four Parts—Dec. 11).—Dr. Manuel Ceneri and Sig. Macari are two conspirators in London, fighting for what they believe to be the freedom of Italy. Ceneri has a nephew and a niece, Anthony and Pauline March. He has used the inheritance left to his nephew to further the purposes of the conspiracy. Pauline receives a letter from her brother declaring his intention of looking into the matter of his inheritance. Macari suggests the death of the boy to Dr. Ceneri as the one way out of the difficulty. Gilbert Vaughan, a wealthy gentleman, has an affection of the eyes, which has caused him to be temporarily blind. One day, when his servant is run down by a cab, he is left bewildered; he counts the steps and enters a house which he believes to be his own. This house happens to be the one occupied by Dr. Ceneri and Macari. Anthony has arrived and is in an angry discussion with his uncle, when Macari slips up behind and drives his dagger home. Pauline rushes into the room, the shock is too much and she falls unconscious. In the hallway Gilbert Vaughan overhears the quarrel; he enters. Because he is blind they spare him his life. However he is drugged and when he awakens he finds himself in his own home.

Two years later, Vaughan, who has recovered his sight, is in Venice. Dr. Ceneri and Sig. Macari are also back in their native land. Pauline, her mind a blank because of the shock over her brother's death, is with them. Vaughan sees the girl and it is a case of love at first sight with him. However, she slips out of sight; he is unable to find sight of her again. Later Vaughan returns to London in despair. One day, while in a museum he again meets Pauline, who is accompanied by her nurse. Through the nurse he secures an introduction to the girl, but her nurse informs him that she does not receive callers. Determined not to be thwarted in his purpose, he follows them home and later calls upon Pauline several times. A love affair is developed. Vaughan proposes marriage. Information of this is carried to the Italians by the nurse. Ceneri sees another chance to win money for "the cause," and so consents to the marriage on condition that the Englishman pay over a certain sum of money, no question asked. Vaughan marries Pauline and then learns that her mind is a blank.

Ceneri, in Russia, is caught in a bomb-throwing plot. He is sent to Siberia for life. Macari calls upon Vaughan and informs him that he is Pauline's brother and through honor, he was forced to slay her lover. The shock deprived her of her memory. Vaughan throttles Macari. In the excitement Pauline, for an instant, recalls something of what happened and falls to the floor unconscious. Vaughan drives the fellow from the house.

The husband remains at the bedside of Pauline. Coming to herself, she rises as in a trance and walks from the house. Vaughan follows. She makes her way to the house formerly occupied by Macari and Ceneri, and to the room in which the crime was committed. Suddenly, in the darkness of the hall, Vaughan recognizes the place he wandered into while deprived of his sight. Pauline, to the surprise of her husband, utters a scream as her memory returns to her. Macari, involved in a saloon brawl, becomes a fugitive from justice. Vaughan learns of the banishment of Dr. Ceneri and leaves for Siberia to learn the truth respecting his wife from his own lips. He locates Ceneri and secures a dying confession as to the purity of Pauline and the truth of the murder of her brother. He then sets out for London and home.

Macari wanders through the back alleys of the city in his flight and by chance enters the house of Vaughan. He comes upon Pauline and tries to get her to rob her husband and leave the country with him. She refuses. Vaughan, returning home, hastens to Pauline's apartment. Macari, hearing him approach, cocks a revolver and tells Pauline he is going to kill her husband. He is thwarted in his purpose, however, by the timely arrival of the police who have surrounded the house. As Vaughan enters the room, a detective shoots Macari from a window, which brings the story to a happy conclusion for the couple.

At last Peter sees an old derelict and manages to get aboard her. His companion dies from want of water. Peter finds the crew all dead from a fever. He runs the vessel into port. In the meantime Hulda's father has persuaded her to give her consent to marry old Absalom in order to save the mill. Peter returns just in time to prevent the wedding. OLD ENOUGH TO BE HER GRANDPA (Nov. 20).—Rollie, the youthful heir to the business of Stephen Barnard, a merchant prince of seventy years, is distracted by a love affair with an actress, Lilyan De Voe. Old Mr. Barnard finds in Lora White, one of the young women employed in the millinery department of his wonderful store, a confidante who appreciates his anxiety for his grandson, and together they devise a plot to break off the infatuation. Madame Brock and others watch what they suppose to be a romance developing between Lora and Mr. Barnard, who is old enough to be her grandfather. It is suggested to Rollie that the girl may be his grandmother yet—and he looks upon his elderly guardian's actions with disgust. Believing that to oppose Rollie's love affair will only aggravate it, Mr. Barnard pretends to approve it, declaring that he too has a right to indulge his affections. He gives a luncheon at his home, suggesting that each invite the lady of his choice. On this occasion, the natural grace, beauty and modesty of Lora appear in forcible contrast to the actress's artificiality and commonness. Rollie begins to envy his grandfather. Soon after, the old gentleman goes away on a business trip, charging his grandson to devote himself to Lora during his absence. On his return he finds that just what he has been conspiring for has happened—Rollie and Lora are engaged.

IN THE CANDLELIGHT (Two Parts—Nov. 23).—A sculptor, John Darby, is insanely jealous of his wife. He does not know that the reason for her apparent intimacy with Bertran, an artist and friend of Darby's is that Bertran is giving her painting lessons in secret, and that Mary is planning to surprise her husband with her talent. He takes their child, Marian, and leaves. The shock results in Mary's death. years later, Bertran has a pupil, Ralph Grove. He has met Marian in the remote country place where her half-crazed father has kept her in hiding since a child. One day he runs across her in the city and learns that her father, in a fit of insane rage, has driven her from home. She wishes to study art and Ralph takes her to Bertran. He thinks that he sees a resemblance between the girl and Mary Darby. Ralph and Bertran determine to unravel the mystery of Marian and her demented father. Meanwhile Ralph has ceased his attentions to Nina, a model, who tries in every way possible to come between him and Marian. Darby comes in search of his daughter. He is taking her home against her will when Ralph gives pursuit. Bertran follows. Ralph finds lodging for the night in Darby's cottage where he believes Marian is hidden. In the dead of night the ex-sculptor tries to kill the young stranger. Bertran arrives just in time to help his pupil grapple with the old man. Then, recognizing Darby, he recalls the past to him and his clouded mind clears. He learns that after all Mary was not unfaithful to him. Peace comes to his troubled spirit, and Ralph and Marian find happiness together.

THE MESSENGER OF GLADNESS (Nov. 22).—Helen's parents had taught her that Thanksgiving Day was a day when everybody should be happy and friendly. So Thanksgiving morning she took a walk to see just how she could help the world to live up to the spirit of the occasion. Very observant, and full of quaint sympathy for everybody she met, she did a lot of good in that little journey, and this is why so many people had to act with her in this film—for most of the names above are those of persons whom Helen helped to be happy and better and more kindly to one another, on the thankfulest day of the year. Then the little "messenger of gladness" went home to mother and father, grandfather and grandmother—and a delicious Thanksgiving dinner.

NATURE'S CELEBRITIES (Nov. 22).—An educational subject on the same reel with the foregoing.

KEYSTONE.

SEA NYMPHS (Two Parts—Nov. 23).—Fatty, with wife, mother-in-law, and impedimenta in the shape of numerous band boxes, bags and bundles, goes for an outing at Santa Catalina Islands. On the steamer he sees charming Mabel and is badly smitten. Mabel is traveling with the parental necessity—a very insignificant-looking little father with side whiskers. Fatty not knowing the relationship decides that he will interfere with "that old duck who is flirting with a young chicken," and, accosting the "old duck" on the deck, he pitches him overboard. Then he goes in quest of Mabel and is enjoying his solitary innings—when he finds out who the man is, whom he has unceremoniously flung into the briny deep.

Father is rescued, and they land at Santa Catalina. Here it is that Ambrose, chronic masher puts in an appearance, and is introduced by father to Mabel. Everybody prepares to go in bathing. Fatty, who is something of a schemer, contrives to get his mother-in-law and Ambrose locked up in the same compartment of the bathing pavilion and he and Mabel run away into the surf, where they have a great swim and feed the seals. Meanwhile, the frantic mother-in-law is rescued from her unconventional tete-a-tete with Ambrose. Mabel's father enlists the muscle of the latter, who is jealous of his plump rival, and together they attack Fatty. The latter does them up, however, and then he and Mabel proceed to give a diving exhibition. Mrs. Fatty and mother-in-law witness this thrilling program, executed off the end of a plank vibrating from the end of the high pier. Mabel excels in the dolphin plunge. The crowd on shore cheer loudly—all except Fatty's immediate family, who are saving their strength for future punishment. Fatty gets his—and the siren Mabel is hastily cloaked and dragged off by her father.

ROYAL.

LOVE FINDS A WAY (Nov. 21).—A gay young bachelor is about to marry an heiress. He subleases his apartments to a man who at once moves in with his wife and daughter. The young man celebrates his bachelor dinner too thoroughly, forgets that he is now living at a hotel and returns to his former rooms. He thinks he sees a young woman in his bed, so he goes into the parlor and bunks on the mantlepiece. In the morning he wakes and falls off with much noise. The daughter runs in to investigate, and the father, rushing in with a gun, demands that the intruder marry his daughter on the spot. At the point of the gun he rushes them off in a taxi to the minister's. Here the bachelor escapes and hailing another cab drives like mad to the home of his fiancee, chased by the angry father in the first vehicle. Meanwhile, there is a fortunate meeting between the daughter and the young man whom she really intends to marry. The bachelor and his fiancee are forced back to the minister's, explanations follow—and the mix-up dissolves in a happy double wedding.

WHEN QUEENIE CAME BACK (Nov. 17).—Mrs. Van Dyke's faithful servant, Queenie Snow, asks for her first vacation in five years. Mrs. Vandyke not only tells her she may go but that she may stay as long as she wishes and that she herself will do the cooking until her return. At the end of twenty-four hours the Van Dykes hardly are on speaking terms. Mrs. Van blames Mr. Van for burning up a pan of biscuits when he was not even in the kitchen but was busy setting the table in the other room. Mr. Van Dyke hurries to the employment agency where he engages a neat, willing appearing creature and takes her home to his delighted wife. The new cook turns out, however, to be obstinate and lazy, so Mr. Van marches her back and returns with another, named Masculina. Cook No. 2 is just what her name implies. Her master and mistress flee from her in terror, and Mrs. Van Dyke writes Queenie that if she will cut short her vacation and come back she will double her pay. To her dismay Queenie replies that she will not be coming back at all, for on her vacation she has met her fate and is to be married the next Sunday. Monday morning Mr. and Mrs. Van Dyke agree to sell out and go to boarding. They are getting the furniture out of the house when message arrives from Queenie. The groom had failed to put in an appearance—and Queenie is coming back! They fill her room with flowers. They buy new furniture for it, and a kimono and slippers and easy chair. Then they meet Queenie in an automo-

ETHEL HAS A STEADY (Eleventh of the "Bill" Series—Nov. 22).—Mr Hadley receives an early call from his fiancee, and it is arranged that she shall come back and go to luncheon with him. Bill, that morning, while delivering a message at another office, is smitten with the pretty stenographer, and on his return begins a letter to her, couched in terms of fondest endearment, on the typewriter. Before he has finished, however, he is sent on another errand, leaving his billet doux in the machine. Ethel has planned to take luncheon with her "steady," but, being very busy at noon with some important letters, is unable to meet him at the time agreed. The steady comes to the office to find out what is the matter and sees Bill's love missive in the typewriter, and concludes this is the explanation. A few minutes later Mr. Hadley's fiancee returns and also discovers the letter. She hears sobs coming from the private office, and while they issue from an unhappy wife trying for a divorce, of course the young lady does not know this, and suspects the worst. When at last the letter reaches the girl for whom it was intended, it falls into the hands of her sweetheart, who promises that a recurrence of the offense will be painful for Bill. The luckless office boy has to explain all round, until at last everybody is pacified. But Bill makes up his mind that he had better journey through life in single blessedness.

MR. HADLEY'S UNCLE (12th of the Bill Series—Dec. 6).—Hadley, anxious to put through a big deal writes his uncle, whom he has never seen, advising him to invest some of his money. The uncle wires Hadley saying he will call on him and bring money with him. In the meantime Mr. Muchmoney, who has a mania for writing checks, takes French leave while the keepers are not looking, and sneaks away from the sanitarium. He wanders along and finally decides to visit an office building.

During his stroll he wanders into Hadley's office and Ethel, thinking he is the rich uncle, detains and tries to entertain him for Hadley. He starts writing checks, buying automobiles, etc., and finally starts to put up the money for Hadley when the keepers, who have discovered his absence, trace him to the office. At the same time the real uncle arrives after many painful experiences, and things are squared.

MAJESTIC.

THE SAVING GRACE (Two Parts—Nov. 22).—Molly Kite, the neglected child of a drunken father, rouses the sympathy of the minister, Mr. Shipton, who also teaches the school at Dead Tree. The minister-school-master persuades some of his parishioners to give the girl decent clothes, and he coaxes her into attending school. At first unruly and sullen, she gradually comes to feel that the minister is her best friend. One day she happens to see him meet a strange girl on the street. Apparently overjoyed, he kisses the stranger. Molly rushes into the house, tears off her new clothes, and vows she will never go to school again. Then her primitive jealousy aflame, she makes her drink-crazed father promise that he will aid her in a plot to kill the minister. The next day Mr. Shipton meets his wayward pupil, in answer to a note he has received from her in an out of the way place. Molly's father is lurking near with his gun. He threatens the minister's life, but, maudlin with drink, has not the will power to pull the trigger. Mr. Shipton talks to the man, calms him and at last takes him home. Meanwhile Molly has discovered that the girl of whom she was so bitterly jealous, is the minister's sister. She begs the minister's forgiveness.

THE SISTERS (Two Parts—Nov. 29).—May and her younger sister, Carol, live in a small town. May is the more lovely of the two, but Carol is wooed by Frank, a country boy. George, a city man, comes to town on a visit, falls in love with Carol and wins her away from Frank. Carol is pleased with his attentions and poor Frank is brokenhearted. Calling one day to see Carol, George meets May and falls madly in love with her, and finally runs away with her and they are married. Carol, in despair, turns back to Frank and they are married, and a year later a baby is born.

In the meantime, May and George have been living in another town. May is about to become a mother. George brings her to her own home for the interesting event and her child is soon born, but is still born. Crying for her baby, the physicians fear to tell her and are forced to try and find a baby to take its place until the wife is strong enough to bear being told the truth. Carol is approached and at first refuses but finally, for her sister's sake, consents and May is made happy.

Carol misses her baby and May refuses to let her bother with "her" child and Carol is frantic but dare not tell the truth. Finally May overhears the truth from the doctor and nurses' conversation and takes the baby back to her real mother, and the sisters are reconciled.

THE OLD GOOD-FOR-NOTHING (Dec. 1).—For years old Morton has been shunned by his family because he lost the fortune his wife had married him for. He had sunk it in a mine that had been partially developed and then pronounced worthless by experts. The loss broke the old man's spirit and he was generally known as "Old-Good-for-Nothing." He was driven from the house, but had an "office" in an old horse stall where he continued to dream out the great future for the abandoned mine.

The mother renewed all her dreams in trying to ensnare a rich husband for her daughter in order that both of them may have the luxuries she nearly obtained. George Denby is the young man who is to marry the daughter. He has never seen old man Morton, who is never allowed around for fear of spoiling everything. The tender heart of Old-Good-for-Nothing is nearly broken when he is ignored at the wedding. The insolent son, Oscar, is to give the daughter away. The old man is half tearfully, half proudly watching the preparations for the ceremony from a coat closet. Here the young groom happens to have his coat and steps in to get a cigarette case out of the pocket and stumbles upon the old man whom he takes for a thief. He hauls him out and all the family are called to the scene. The bride shows some heart in her attitude toward her old father. Denby insists that the old man give them away.

After the wedding the old man and Denby become chums. In return for all the good things Denby has done for him the old man makes him a confident and actually leads Denby to take faith in his mine. Denby secretly goes ahead and ties up all his money in buying the land and equipment for the new mine.

The son, Oscar, discovers the project by accident. Is first horrified at his family losing the hard-earned second fortune and then suspicious that here must be something in it for all this investment. He breaks into his father's "office" at night, gets a copy of the location figures of mine and sends it to an expert geologist who reports that the land embraced by those figures is barren, but the land to the west of that location was rich in gold deposits. Oscar hurries to the spot and secretly and hurriedly gets option on the property to the west, in the end borrowing $10,000 from Denby to close the deal.

Then Oscar returns home to tell on his father and watch the ruin of Denby. The mother and daughter are naturally ready to kill the old man on seeing him the cause of all their hopes again being dashed to the ground with the same shallow dream. They drive him out of their home for good. Denby rescues him. Denby is then assaulted by the whole family for his foolhardiness. He says that it is not so until confronted by the official geological report. He hastens away to make sure.

He gets the local government expert, gives him the same location figures and the report is the same. In despair he hurries home to save the remnants. In the meantime Oscar has spread broadcast the reports of the experts that the new mine is worthless and Denby finds his credit ruined. Without funds, he now asks Oscar to repay him the $10,000 he borrowed. Oscar laughs at him. Denby is about to strike him down when Mrs. Morton intervenes, ordering her son-in-law from the house.

"Old-Good-for-Nothing," left alone, is illumined by the idea that something is radically wrong. He seeks out the mine surveyors and they undertake to verify his figures and find that they were wrong. The land to the west that Oscar had bought is barren of gold; the new mine is rich in it. He telegraphs the good news to Denby.

Denby tears up Oscar's I. O. U. Oscar, ruined, leaves home and is met by his father with his first dividend of $5,000 in his pocket; he gives the money to Oscar.

RELIANCE.

HIS RESPONSIBILITY (Two Parts—Nov. 21).—Wallace, a young broker, rescues from drowning an heiress whom later he marries. In order to support her in the luxury to which she is accustomed, he goes in for heavy speculation and loses. At about the same time a friend to whom he has entrusted money for investment, absconds with the funds. Things go from bad to worse, until Wallace finds himself ruined. His wife is expecting a baby, and the young man is desperate. He thinks of suicide, as he carries a large policy with the premium paid far in advance. But he realizes that suicide precludes payment. So he hires a notorious gunman "to kill a man" who will wear a white hat and carry a raincoat on passing a given point at 10.30 on a certain night. The thug agrees, is paid, and on the night appointed, lies in wait. He is pulled off, however by a detective who chances to see him taking aim—and Wallace passes and repasses the spot in vain. Returning home the ex-broker finds a letter from the friend who ran away West with his money, enclosing a check for $100,000. Jones had struck it rich in oil lands, and his conscience reasserting itself, had decided to made Wallace his partner in one of the richest wells in Kansas.

THE LUCKY SHOT.—(Dec. 2).—Clark, a young shipping clerk, goes West, discouraged at loss of his job and failure to get another. He promises his mother he will help her and send for her when he strikes a good job. He falls among bad companions and is desperately hard up for money. He works at prospecting unsuccessfully and finally gets a job at a mine. Later he receives word of his mother's illness and needs money badly.

He is sent later on a trip across the mountains with a lot of money and he determines to risk all, steal the money and get away. But an outlaw sees him start and follows, planinng to fire from ambush and take his money from him. He follows through the hills for a long distance and when the young man sits down to eat his lunch, the outlaw fires at him from behind. The boy, however, in sitting down to eat has placed his hat on a bit of rock above his head. The outlaw, from the rear, hits only the hat, which, disappearing from view, causes him to believe he has killed the boy. He takes so much time to cross the gully across which he shot that the boy has gone and has hid himself. The outlaw flees and the boy, looking closer, sees where the shot has chipped off a bit of the rock, disclosing to view a rich vein of gold! The boy locates a claim and sells out to advantage. His meditated but unsuccessful crime brings him luck at last and teaches him a lesson as well.

WHO SHOT BUD WALTON?—(Two Parts—Dec. 5.—Lafe Johnson, sheriff of Badger and his friend, Dan, bury Tom Rooker, whom they find dead hanging from a tree. As they return to the town the sheriff believes that the hanging was caused by Bud Walton, a bad man. Bud Walton and Jeff Hardin, another bad man, are deadly enemies. Rooker and Hardin were pals and the sheriff feels that in a spirit of revenge, Walton was instrumental in Rooker's death, because the latter was Hardin's close friend.

Owing to the feud between Walton and Hardin, and to insure a certain amount of security to the other citizens, the town has been divided into two sections. Walton is permitted to come and go at will in one section and Hardin has the same privileges in the other, but each is forbidden to trespass in the other's territory. While the sheriff and Dan are playing dominoes in the Fashion saloon, Hardin enters and tells the sheriff that Walton has been making threats against his (Hardin's) life. Johnson advises him that it won't be healthy for either Hardin or Walton to start a fight. Hardin then takes a seat in the barroom facing the door, while Daniel Boone, the faro dealer, plays cards with an imaginary opponent.

Tillie is employed at the Fashion and talks friendly with Hardin. A boy enters the barroom and tells the sheriff that he is wanted at the express office and the sheriff leaves. Bud Walton enters and drawing his pistol walks up to Hardin with the statement that "he has got him now." Hardin draws his gun but Walton is the quicker. Just as Walton fires, another shot is heard and Walton drops dead. By this time Hardin has drawn his gun and fires several times at Walton.

When the sheriff enters Hardin hands him his gun and gives himself up. Peculiar circumstances cause the sheriff to make a detailed investigation. At the inquest Hardin showed how his life was saved by a bible. Some time before he had picked up the bible from the coroner's table and showed that Walton's bullet had struck the bible in his breast pocket and became imbedded in the pages of the book. Hardin admitted that he had killed five men. The inquest is postponed while the sheriff asks for two days to find the murderer. Hardin is held upon the nominal charge of stealing a bible.

The sheriff and Dan then ride away to bring back the real murderer and the sheriff tells his companion that while Hardin carried a 45 calibre revolver, Walton had been shot with a 30-30 rifle bullet which was fired from a small room directly back of where Hardin was sitting. The sheriff states further that a man's imprint of a hand on the wall in axle grease was another clue. At a nearby ranch, Johnson arrests Slim Terry, who is eating at a table. The trial is resumed the following day and Slim admits he killed Walton, shooting from the small room, because Walton had run him out of town. While Slim is admitting the crime, Tillie rushes into the courtroom and states Slim is a liar because she shot Walton. She adds that Slim was her sweetheart but that Walton had run him out of town, and they had run after her. Tillie states further that she hid Slim in the room purposely to shoot Walton, but Slim could not shoot straight. She then had Slim place his hands against the wall and aiming her rifle at Walton she fired and Walton fell dead. Slim had accidentally placed his hand in axle grease which caused his imprint to appear on the wall. His extreme height caused the imprints to appear high and the sheriff knew they were made by an exceedingly tall man. Tillie tells further of Walton's persecutions of her and that Slim was her only friend.

Consternation reigns in the courtroom. The judge returns a verdict that Walton just died and Slim, Hardin and Tillie are discharged. The sheriff then informs Tillie that the town of Badger will stake her and Slim to a wedding.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 45 (Nov. 23).—Margaret was pining for an adventure. Mary, the old woman whom she had recently visited in the forsaken mansion, haunted her imagination and played upon her sympathy until she made up her mind she would again seek that forlorn old soul. So, one morning when Aunt Abbie had stayed home to read De Morgan, Margaret motored to the ramshackle house. Old Mary greeted her kindly. "Have you found Walter?" was her first question. When Our Mutual Girl reluctantly answered in the negative, she flew into a furious temper. "Get out of my house then!" she screamed. "And don't come back till you've found him."

Margaret went home with a pain in her heart. She told Aunt Abbie about it, but received scant sympathy, for the timid lady was in terror of Margaret's going near the demented Mary. Then, deciding that her niece needed "some good, healthy shopping exercise," she laid aside her book with a sigh, and suggested that they go to Joseph's.

In the famous millinery establishment on Fifth avenue, Margaret chose several bewitching models in hats and furs. She seemed restored to her usual spirits. Then, a most surprising adventure befell Our Mutual Girl, all unsought, right in the exclusive modiste's atelier—the last place in the world where one would have looked for anything of an unconventional nature to happen. Margaret and her Aunt were standing admiring some rhinestone buckles in the show case, their backs turned to the room, when an old man, evidently a clerk or department chief, approached. As Margaret looked around, his eyes became fixed on her pretty face. He became an ashen gray, his hands moving automatically to his forehead, then he dropped to the floor in a dead faint.

They removed him to the hospital room upstairs, and Margaret, who was puzzled beyond words by the incident, learned something about him from the manager of the shop. There was a mystery about the old man. Impulsively Margaret begged to be taken to the hospital room, in case she might be of some help. When she entered she heard him telling the doctor, who was bending over him, the story of his youth—it was the masculine edition of old Mary's story. The two narratives dovetailed like the halves of a picture puzzle. Then, Our Mutual Girl, with beating heart, crossed the room swiftly to the old man's side.

She thought he would faint a second time. But he roused himself, and the shock of seeing her seemed to have cleared his long befogged memory. For the first time since he had stumbled into the shop and found a position there, he remembered his name—it was Walter Van Horn.

"The miracle days have not gone by!" cried Margaret in an ecstacy. Then she ordered the automobile—and within the hour Our Mutual Girl had reunited the lovers, lost to one another for almost fifty years.

Mrs. Livingston, Eleanor's step-mother, buys goods extravagantly at fashionable shopping places, and has the goods charged to her account. Dick receives a letter from a bank, saying that Mrs. Livingston has overdrawn her account $1,100, and requesting settlement without disturbing Judge Livingston. Dick tries to persuade Mrs. Livingston to attend to the overdrawn account, but she becomes angry and resolves to break Dick's engagement to Eleanor. Mrs. Livingston then tells the judge that Dick is not a proper fiance for Eleanor.

Eleanor finds recreation in doing settlement work, attracting the attention of several men engaged in white slavery acts. These evildoers forge a note purporting to be from a poor woman, asking Eleanor to come to her aid in the tenements. Leaving the note on a desk in her home, Eleanor goes to render the aid asked, and when she arrives at the address given, the white slavers seize her and make her a prisoner. Dick accidentally finds the note and rushes to rescue Eleanor, as he feels that the note was forged. Dick arrives at the house where Eleanor is held captive, and, after a desperate fight with the plotters, the men are taken prisoners; Eleanor and Dick manage to return home.

The debts Mrs. Livingston owes become pressing; she tries at night to steal funds from her husband's safe, and Dick finds her near the safe. To escape accusation, Mrs. Livingston charges Dick with the theft, and he, to shield her, shoulders the blame in the presence of the judge and Eleanor. The judge believes his wife, and tells Dick he must leave the house forever. Mrs. Livingston then repents, tells her husband she alone is to blame, begs his forgiveness.

Harry Wentworth decides to ship on a coastwise vessel. On the first voyage out he incurs the wrath of the captain by interfering with him during a fight on board. Wentworth and his two pals, Beannie and Mac, have a fight with the crew, and after a hard tussle, escape by diving overboard. When the three swim safely to shore, Wentworth decides that he has had enough of sea life, and returns home, taking his two pals along with him to work on the ranch. He arrives home, learns of his father's business troubles and that the lawyer is about to foreclose the mortgage on the ranch. He meets Ethel Crandall and learns that she is the gambler's sister. He falls in love with her, and persuades Ralph Crandall to quit gambling. Jim Martin, infuriated over the love affair between Harry and Ethel, decides to have the girl abducted. Harry and Ralph conspire to get the mortgage back. In a game of cards Ralph plays the lawyer's hand and lets Harry take the winnings. The lawyer, angry at this, decides to take the girl away. His plot is overheard by Harry's pals, who notify him and her brother Ralph, who immediately start in pursuit. The end is a sensation.

LITTLE SUNBEAM (Three Parts—Balboa).—Melody and Blossom, two orphans, aged about sixteen, live in a little shack by a stream. Melody plays a little violin, and Blossom sells flowers. Their only friend is the village minister, who loves them. As they go along the road on their way to the city, playing and selling flowers, they encounter different people, whom they make happy with their music and flowers.

In the city Melody plays before a lovely house. Inside a woman sits restless and sad. Ray Wilton, a society man, enters her room. She seems bored, and he questions her. As she hears the strains of Melody's violin, she sees a vision of herself at her mother's knee, and the old father comes behind the mother's chair. The vision fades away, and the girl denounces Ray, telling him she is through with this life.

Later, Ray Wilton and some club men at the club propose a fishing trip. They go to the country, and here Blossom again meets Ray. As she is crossing the stream, she slips, spraining her ankle. He carries her to the little shack. Blossom is unconscious, and Melody will not let Ray take care of her. She instinctively distrusts him. Later, Ray meets Blossom and gives her her first kiss. Innocently she tells Melody about the wonderful kiss, and shows her the beads. Melody is filled with misgivings, and warns Blossom not to have anything to do with him. Blossom tells her she loves him, and they have their first quarrel. That night Blossom leaves with Ray.

Sometime later Melody sets out to search for Blossom; Blossom is seen in her new home, daintily dressed in city clothes. She asks Ray when they will be married, and he laughingly changes the subject. On the streets Melody plays. Grief adds a peculiar charm to her playing. One day she faints in the street, and a well-dressed old man takes her in his taxi. She is brought to the home of Jack Bennard, a young artist. Later she is adopted and, after hard study, sent to Italy, where the artist's brother takes care of her.

Blossom is seen one day sewing on a white garment. Ray enters the room, and asks to see it. Blossom, in sweet shame, confesses all. Ray becomes bitter, and tells her it cannot be. They quarrel, and she goes. Blossom comes home to the old village minister. Brokenly she confesses all to him at the gate. He takes her in his arms like a tired child and leads her into him home. Melody in Italy, has completed her studies and, after a farewell party given by the students, she returns home with Jack. They become engaged on board the steamer. At home again, Melody still mourns for Blossom, and one day in the garden tells Jack what grieves her. Alone, Jack resolves to visit the old shack where they once lived. He sets up the canvas to paint the picture, and starts. Blossom is sitting in the grassy field with a wreath on her head, singing. She starts as Jack comes toward her, and as he kneels and parts the tall thick grass, Jack sees a tiny baby asleep. He is touched at the sight, and proposes sketching them. She agrees. In the city, Melody gives her first concert. In the box near the stage are Jack and his parents and Ray Wilton enters. As the music starts and Melody raises her violin, at the sound Ray sees himself and Blossom walking among the flowers, happy, he stoops to kiss her. Ray, overcome with emotion, staggers from the box. Jack follows him, and takes him to the studio. Here Ray gets to feel better. He sees a large canvas covered with white, and asks to see it, to change the subject. The painting makes him confess all. Jack tells him he must go to her. Ray leaves soon: Melody comes in carrying armfuls of flowers and roses from the stage. In the country, Ray and Blossom are married among the flowers, Blossom holding her baby.

Neva finally decides to become the betrothed of Edwin, and when she announces her decision, Hal becomes embittered and forsakes the village, going to a city where he obtains work in a fashionable hotel as bellboy. His youth and good looks win the admiration of one of the hotel guests, Miss Ruth Grant, a handsome young woman of wealth. Ruth professes love for Hal, and they marry. In the meantime, Edwin and Neva have been joined in marriage. Hal and Ruth send an invitation to Edwin and Neva to come to the city and visit them. When Edwin and Neva arrive at Hal's home they admire a $10,000 necklace worn by Ruth. Edwin and Neva then decide to make their home in the city and rent a house, which they occupy. Hal and Ruth give a masque ball, and Neva obtains from Ruth the loan of her necklace to wear at the ball. A gang of robbers read of the forthcoming ball and decide to attend in masquerade costumes. The gang leader manages to steal the necklace from Neva during the dancing. Edwin and Neva fear to tell Hall and Ruth of the theft, and, fearing condemnation, they buy a similarly-appearing necklace worth $10,000 from a jeweler, on credit, signing a contract to pay $1,000 a year. This substitute necklace is given to Hal and Ruth. For ten years Edwin and Neva toil from early until late to earn the money to pay the jeweler, undergoing great privations. When they make the final payment the truth of the substitution is revealed to Hal and Ruth, and the latter then tell Edwin and Neva that the original stolen stolen necklace was only a string of paste imitation gems.

LITTLE JACK (Three Parts—Balboa).—Little Sunbeam, an orphan, was adopted by her uncle at a very young age, and at he was a leader of a gang of thieves and outlaws, he kept her sex a secret from the gang, and dressed Sunbeam in boys' clothes and called her Jack. This story takes up "Jack" at the age of 14. Dan Moran, a wealthy lumberman, returning from a trip of inspection of his forest reserves, stops for shelter at Uncle Bill's. Little Jack makes things very comfortable for the handsome stranger. Little Jack climbs up the ladder to her attic bed. Moran decides to retire to his room for the night, but in the presence of the gang displays a priceless watch and chain. After Moran has retired to his room, the gang plans to rob Moran. Little Jack, from the attic above, hears their plans, climbs out of her window, and warns Moran. While he dresses, she goes to the barn and fetches his horse, and Moran makes his escape. Little Jack, knowing the fate she would suffer at the hands of Bill when the flight of Moran would be discovered, decides never to return to the house of crime, and strikes out for the unknown. In the morning she finds herself near a railroad track. At a watering tank nearby, she gets into a freight car and steals a ride. At the end of the trip she finds herself in a great city. Getting out of the car and out of the yards, she sees a couple of hoboes camping, and goes up to them. They, of course, think her a boy. One night, one of these tramps proposes to rob a nearby lumber mill office. They make little Jack climb through a window to open the door for them; but is shot by the night watchman, and the gang make their getaway. Jack is taken to a hospital for treatment. The next morning, Dan Moran is told of the attempted robbery of his office, and goes to the hospital to see the little burglar. The nurse has discovered that Jack is a girl and curls her hair and fixes her up. Moran is surprised to find this beautiful girl and the little "Jack," who saved him from the thieves one and the same kid. Moran's mother adopts the child and educates her, and they make a happy family. Now Moran's elder partner, Fox, sees a chance of acquiring the entire business for himself. He goes to the office one night to carry out his ideas, and is surprised by the night watchman, and to protect his secret he shoots the watchman. Moran, passing by, has seen the light in his office and heard the shot, and rushes into the ojce, finds the dead man, and calls up the police. Fox fastens the crime onto Moran, and Moran is placed under arrest. Sunbeam calls on Moran at the jail, and he tells her his suspicion of Fox. Sunbeam remembers how she deceived people in her dress as a boy, so dressed as an office boy, she applies for and gets the position of office boy in the lumber office of Moran and Fox. She gets enough opportunity to see how Fox changed and juggled figures, experts are called and Fox is shown up, and later confesses. Moran is released, and Sunbeam becomes mistress of the Moran home and lifelong partner of Dan Moran.

THE WALLS OF JERICHO (Five Parts).—Jack Frobisher, a sheep farmer in Queensland, has returned to England a millionaire, bought his way into the inner circle of Vanity Fair, married the daughter of a marquis, and settled in Mayfair, with a country house outside, a shooting box in Scotland, and a yacht on the "Solent." Having accepted the patronage of a titled family, he is forced to lend money to his father-in-law, and having fallen in love with a society woman, he becomes a witness of the vacuous amusements of the smart set settles her score when she is a very heavy loser at bridge and watches her flirtations with fashionable idlers in general and with a contemptible rake, Harry Dallas, in particular. The return of Hanky Bannister, one of his Australian pals, and a millionaire like himself, opens the way for a patrician intrigue for the enrichment of the marquis' family by the marriage of Lady Lucy Derenham. Frobisher is unable to interest Eva, his wife, or her relations in his schemes for making a good use of his money in the erection of sanitary dwellings in the East End, and he is disgusted with the tendencies of fashionable life and anxious to keep his friend, Bannister, out of a marriage similar to his own. A sympathetic friend Lady Westerby, tells him that she is disappointed in finding him so tame a bear, and assures him that he has only to shout and the walls of Jericho will fall flat. At the marquis' house during a ball, and a game of bridge in Lady Alethea Frobisher's boudoir, during which one of her titled players cheats, wins a lot of money and suddenly discovers that he has an engagement and must go. The most serious flirtation of the smart wife ends in a declaration of love by Harry Dallas, which is interrupted by the gloomy, serious husband.

The trumpets of rams horns are blown, and the Australian shouts before the Jericho of smartness. The battle opens when Frobisher insists upon helping the titled brother-in-law to marry a girl whose honor his been compromised and to make a fresh start in the colonies.

The Marquis is angry over the Australian interference with family coat of honor, and Lady Alethea attempts to reduce the rebel to submission by sarcastic flings at his tiresome virtue. The trumpets sound again when Frobisher attempts to prevent a marriage between his sister-in-law and the infatuated Bannister by telling him how heartless and mercenary she is; and there is another blast when the rake, Harry Dallas, is compelled to read to the indignant husband a love letter written to the wife. The Walls of Jericho are rent asunder and thrown down when Frobisher announces that he will sell his property in England and go back to Queensland with his wife and child. The welkin rings when this social Joshua guarding the ark of the covenant of manhood shouts in trumpet tones, "I have enough of these companions of vours, these wretched sexless women who do nothing but flirt and gamble. I've had enough of their brainless, indecent talk, where everything good is turned into ridicule and each word has a double meaning. I've had enough of this existence of ours, in town and country, where all the men make love to their neighbors' wives. I'm done with it, done with it all." Furious as is the onslaught, Lady Alethea offers stubborn resistance and refuses to surrender. Later, with the mediation of Lady Westerby, before a reconciliation can be effected and Frobisher enabled to carry her off to Queensland.

By that time the Walls of Jericho are indeed fallen flat.

THE STORMS OF LIFE (Three Parts—White Star).—George Lloyd, land owner, orders the fishermen in a coast village to vacate the property. Lloyd quarrels with his son Fred, an art student, and the latter leaves home and embarks on a steamer, from which he falls and is rescued by a fisherman known as Captain Jack. Fred's memory is lost by the fall.

In the village he wooes Nan, a fisher girl, thereby incurring the enmity of Joe Porter. Nan accepts Fred's love. Fred's father wages war on the fisherman. A battle over possession of the land takes place, and in the fight Porter shoots Fred in the back. Nan nurses Fred to recovery, and they are married, Fred still unaware of his identity. Porter becomes a desperado, and joins a gang of smugglers.

Fred paints a picture of Nan, and an artist takes the portrait to a city, where it wins high praise. The painting is purchased by Blanche Dexter, a former fiance of Fred, and she, with Fred's mother, visit the fishing village to see the man who painted the portrait. Blanche and Fred's mother see Fred, and the sight of his parent restores Fred's memory.

Porter about this time abducts Nan in a boat, but Fred rescues her. His mother pleads with him to return home. Fred learns that his father is dead and that he has inherited the estate. Blanche, meanwhile, falls under the wiles of Porter, and meets him secretly.

Fred leaves his wife, Nan, their baby having died, and goes home with his mother. Fred indulges himself at cafes and forgets Nan, who is pining away in the village. Porter follows Blanche to the city, but later he returns to Nan and asks her to accept his love. She spurns him and, believing Fred lost to her forever, she rows a boat far out to sea and fails to return. Fred sees a vision of Nan, and prepares to return to her. He goes to the village and learns that Nan's body was washed ashore. He finds her grave beside the place where their child was buried, the two crosses bearing silent witness to the entanglements in the web of fate.

ROSE OF THE ALLEY (Balboa—Three Parts).—At an early age Rose O'Brien loses her mother, which leaves her without a relative in the world. She goes to live with some neighbors, during which time a typical Fagan discovers her plight, and through promises of pretty dresses, induces her to steal.

She is arrested, found guilty, and placed in the charge of a probation officer. This officer finds a good position for her in a wealthy family. The son later falls in love with her. They are secretly married, and the following day Rose finds another woman in her husband's arms. Not knowing that he merely picked up the woman from a faint, Rose leaves her husband, and being a good dancer goes to the city, where she secures an engagement in a theatrical company.

In the meantime, her husband, who loves her and who does not understand her flight, is taken abroad for his health, and rapidly declines. At the end of the year, however, he returns home, and a dinner is given in his honor. Rose, now a famous dancer, is engaged to dance at the dinner, where she and her husband are mutually surprised in their recognition. Reconciliation follows, and everything ends happily.

THE VOW (Three Parts—Nemo).—Beatrice lives with her father and her brother, Bernard, in a fishing village in Sicily. Lorenzo, a neighbor, wooes Beatrice, but is repulsed, and becomes a secret enemy of Bernard. Donald Hanford, an American author, his sister, Elsie, and their friend, Dexter Harrison, come to the village as tourists. Bernard and Hanford quarrel over Anonetta, a gay Sicilian woman, and the men agree to fight a duel with pistols. Bernard, not aware of Lorenzo's enmity, makes Lorenzo his second. Hanford, having no wish to kill Bernard, extracts the bullets from his pistol, but Lorenzo changes the pistols, and in the duel Bernard is shot dead. Beatrice swears a vendetta against the slayer of her brother, but the identity of the Americans being unknown to either herself or Lorenzo, she tells Lorenzo she would wed him if he locates the Americans. Lorenzo remembers having seen one of the pistols marked "D. H." Lorenzo searches, finds the Americans, and sees Harrison and his betrothed, Elsie, chatting together. Learning Harrison's initials, Lorenzo and Beatrice believe Harrison to be the slayer of Bernard. Harrison and Elsie suddenly go to London, and Beatrice sends Lorenzo there to kill Harrison. Hanford goes boating, meets disaster, and is saved from drowning by Beatrice's father, and taken to their home and nursed by her. They fall in love, Hanford proposes marriage, but Beatrice says she is bound by a vow to Lorenzo. Beatrice prays, a vision of her dead brother appears, tells her not to be bound by the vow, and later she accepts Hanford's offer to wed. Lorenzo learns in London that Harrison is not the man who shot Bernard, and returns home, there learning that the man he is to kill is betrothed to Beatrice. Lorenzo goes to a cliff to slay the lovers, but Bernard's vision comes, accuses Lorenzo of the slaying, and Lorenzo falls to his death on the rocks below the cliff.

ECLECTIC.

THE TAINT (Pathe—Four Parts).—Madame Bartlett, a celebrated biologist, employs Vera Knight as her assistant at the suggestion of a friend and soon comes to love her for the many good qualities the girl possesses. Chilton, Mme. Bartlett's secretary, is hard up for money through steady and severe losses at gambling, and begins to falsify the account books in order to replenish his funds. In the meantime, his charm of manner has created a profound impression upon Vera's heart, and when he proposes marriage she accepts with a happy heart. Relying upon his honor and promises, Vera becomes a victim of abused confidence and soon finds herself in an embarrassing position. She asks for and obtains a leave of absence and retires to a farm in the country where her child is born. Chilton, in the meantime, continually postpones their marriage on various pretexts.

While the secretary is talking to one of his creditors one day, Mme. Bartlett overhears the conversation which makes her suspicious. A little later in Chilton's absensce she examines the ledgers and finds proof of the secretary's peculations. Shortly afterwards Vera comes down to the city to make one last plea to the man who abused her trust in him. While she is beseeching him to keep his promise and marry her, Mme. Bartlett enters the room, confronts the secretary with his double guilt and tells him he must marry the girl or go to jail. Frantic with the fear of public exposure, Chilton that night enters the Bartlett library, and, finding the ledgers, tears the incriminating pages from the books. He also seizes the opportunity of taking whatever valuables he finds.

While he is engaged in doing this, he is overheard by Mme. Bartlett, who enters and catches him. A struggle follows in which the woman is shot and killed. The commotion is heard by Vera, who rushes in just as Chilton has escaped through the window. While she is bending over the body of her friend the servants come in and accuse her of the crime. She is arrested, tried and found guilty on circumstantial evidence, and receives a life sentence. While the years of her life in jail roll away her infant son, adopted by the farmer and his wife, grows up to manhood in ignorance of his real parentage.

By good conduct Vera becomes a "trusty" and, as such, enjoys the confidence of the prison officials. By a strange accident she uncovers a plot among the convicts to overpower their guards and escape. By means of her warning the revolt is nipped in the bud. For this Vera is rewarded with a pardon and freedom.

Twenty years have now elapsed and the eager mother longs to see again her boy. Going back to the farmhouse where she left him, without disclosing her identity, she learns that her son has become a successful business man and is engaged to the daughter of Senator Bristow. Determined not to cast a shadow upon the young man's happiness, Vera leaves the words unsaid that a mother's heart prompts her to speak. She accepts a position in the Secret Service and soon becomes of value to the organization.

She is soon assigned to a case wherein a certain Baron Metzger is reported to be attempting to steal plans of certain fortifications of the United States Government. While running down the clues she finds that her own son is strangely implicated in some way with Metzger. Her astonishment is increased when she recognizes in the Baron the Paul Chilton who betrayed her. She does not know that Metzger has persuaded the young man to gamble and that her son has lost beyond his means. To further her investigations, Vera has Senator Bristow make her his secretary.

Metzger gets Walter so completely in his power that he is able to persuade the young man to aid him in securing the much-desired papers. Walter invites his prospective father-in-law to ride with him in an auto driven by Metzger in disguise. By means of a drugged cigar the Senator becomes unconscious. In tardy revulsion at his complicity in the unworthy act, Walter refuses to steal the papers. Metzger does so instead. The Senator recovers consciousness and a struggle follows which ends in him being hurled dying from the car to the road. How Walter becomes suspected of the crime but through his mother escapes the implication; how Metzger is pursued until finally the runaway locomotive in which he is attempting to escape leaves the track and carries him to his death end a most absorbing drama.

THE CROWN OF RICHARD III (Pathe—Three Parts).—To satisfy his ambitious craving for power, the Duke of Glocester calls upon his sorceress, Rahel, to learn through her mystic magic what the future holds in store for him. She, through the aid of her magic mirror, tells him that he will obtain his ambitions but by the shedding of blood.

Glocester then seeks the aid of a chemist famed for the manufacture of poisons and secures from him a deadly concoction which the Duke surreptitiously places in the cup of the King, who is only now convalescent from a severe illness. The King drinks and then dies in the presence of his wife and children. The first obstacles in the path of his ambitions now removed, the Duke plots to remove the two princes, in turn natural heirs to the throne. He endeavors to enlist the aid of Buckingham, who, while at first consenting, soon repents and allies himself with the queen. The queen sees many of her most devoted adherents led to the scaffold and is prepared for the worst. Buckingham tells her of the duke's sinister intentions toward her sons and flees with her to the sanctuary of Westminister Abbey. They arrive there none too soon. Glocester and his party are in hot pursuit and reach the Abbey just in time to see the intended victims disappear through the gates.

Foiled in his purpose, Glocester seeks the aid of Sir Tyrrel, now in a dungeon under a sentence of death. To him he offers life and liberty if he will do his will. Tyrrel assents to the offer. Glocester, however, receives a note from Rahel telling him that neither Tyrrel nor she dare brave the sanctity of the sanctuary, but that she knows men who will. Thus the Duke hires a band of assassins to take the intended victims. The Abbey is attacked by the cutthroats with fire and sword and the princes captured, but not before Buckingham falls wounded in their defence. The princes are thrust in the Tower under the guard of Tyrrel.

Forgetful of self, the frantic queen in her desire to save her children tells Glocester she will surrender the crown if the young princes will only be returned to her. Glocester, however, proposes to carry out his intentions toward them. To counteract his ambitions, Buckingham finds means to communicate with Tyrrel and offers to him all that Glocester promised him and more, if he will only ally himself with the right. Tyrrel consents and admits Buckingham to the tower. It is too late—Buckingham has barely time to hide before the assassins, led by Glocester, rush into the princes' apartment and strangle them.

Shortly afterwards the bereaved queen has the satisfaction of seeing the outraged kingdom rise against the royal murderer and under Buckingham compel the Duke to pay the penalty for his crimes.

WHIFFLES WINS THE WINSOME.—Our friend Whiffles has a most interesting flirtation over the telephone with a young lady employed in the gas office. Her voice is so soft and pleasant that he is convinced that she is charming. On the other hand, Whiffles' conversation is so interesting that the young lady is equally anxious to meet him. An appointment is being made when the girl is called aside by the manager for a moment. A stern-visaged, middle-aged woman, a fellow-employee in the office seizes the opportunity to pick up the phone and makes the appointment for herself. The meeting place is chosen for a certain spot in the Zoological Park, and the signal is mutually agreed upon as the waving of a handkerchief.

Whiffles, filled with delightful anticipation, keeps the appointment—so does the wrong woman. Whiffles catches a good look at that unlovely face and flees. In the meantime the other girl has called our friend up at his house and has been imprudently answered by the servant. Thinking that it is Whiffles, she sends him her photo and writes him that she does this to show him what he has missed. Whiffles gets the photo and perceives there has been a mistake somewhere. He calls her up on the phone, and tells her he will kill hemself if she doesn't come around and see him. To gain her sympathy he makes use of a novel scheme, and so all's well that ends well.

COLOMBO (On the same reel as foregoing).—Beautiful views of the capital of Ceylon, the "pearl of the Orient." A city that we have all heard of, but know very little about passes before our eyes in a series of intimate views.

THE POLICE DOG.—The extraordinary intelligence of this particular police dog will "get the film over" with any audience to the accompaniment of roars of laughter. While the particular cop to whom he is attached is taking him, securely fastened by a leash, on his rounds the dog spies a suspicious character in the shape of a cat. At once there is a grand uproar and pursuit. The cat goes like a streak—and so does the dog, dragging with him the poor cop. Through a sewer pipe into a muddy pool, over the rocks, the strange procession dashes. After this unfortunate "faux pas," the dog wisely keeps at a distance from the cop.

A little later, seeing a beggar seated on the sidewalk with a card saying "help the blind," the dog sees his opportunity. Holding up the beggar's hat in his teeth, he "begs" the passers-by for alms. The "fake" blind beggar sees the resulting harvest with joy. But vengeance is near. The cop approaches and confiscates the ill-gotten gains. There are other amusing experiences which the dog goes through. Mr. Bray certainly had a pleasing flight of fancy when he made these pictures.

THE FRIEND OF BIRDS (On the same reel as foregoing).—An interesting half reel showing the methods used by scientists to capture wild birds, band their legs and then release them in order to determine their habits of migration, etc. The coloring adds to the interest of these "close up" nature views.

THE TOREADOR'S OATH (Pathe—Three Parts).—A child of poverty, Juanita contributes to a slim family purse by selling provisions in the streets. The famous toreadors, Gayetano and Manuel, are attracted by her unusual charms, and the latter follows the girl to learn where she lives. Juanita's mother, an avaricious woman, upbraids her for failing to increase her earnings. Ruy, a half-witted farmer boy, is enslaved in a hopeless passion for the Spanish beauty, who ignores his every plea.

Manuel comes in the evening to serenade Juanita. Gayetano, his friend, returning from a bull-fight, the next day again meets Juanita, who agrees to meet him the following evening. The next day, however, Manuel offers to make Juanita his wife but is spurned by her, although her mother is greatly impressed by the wealthy toreador's proposal. In the evening Gayetano calls to keep his appointment with Juanita. Mutually attracted, they take a solemn vow to be true to each other unto death. Gayetano, in his new love, soon forgets that he is betrothed to Manuel's sister, Conchita. Soon after they are married, Gayetano takes his bride to his home. Manuel and Ruy, unsuccessful in their courtships, plot to separate the happy couple. Their chance comes when Gayetano takes leave of Juanita and leaves to take part in a bull fight. Manuel makes a final effort to win Juanita's love, and, failing, decides to take desperate measures. Juanita is told by Ruy that her mother is dying. Hastening to her parent, she is made captive by Manuel, who takes her to a lonely farm in the mountains, and leaves her in charge of Ruy. Manuel then hastens to Gayetano and convinces him that Juanita is false and untrue. Gayetano vows that he will have nothing more to do with her.

Juanita, exerting her influence over the half-witted Ruy, succeeds in making her escape. learning that Manuel has decided to enter the bull fight, she goes to the arena where thousands of spectators have already gathered to witness the contests. She makes her way to a point where she can see to the best advantage. soon the toreadors enter the arena amid the tumultuous applause of the crowd. Manuel becomes engaged with a savage bull, which, infuriated, endeavors to rid himself of his tormentors. Watching for a critical moment, Juanita sees her opportunity as the furious animal rushes at Manuel. Raising her voice above the din of countless voices, she cries aloud, "Manuel! Manuel!" Hearing his name the toreador turns to locate the sound. Too late he realizes his error as he is borne to earth and terribly gored by the bull. Rescued at length by the attendants, Manuel is carried aside. Bending over the dying man, Gayetano promises him that he will marry Conchita as soon as he is free to do so. He secures a divorce from Juanita and prepares to keep his promise. At the wedding Juanita calls uninvited and, fascinating Gayetano by her wiles, she draws him to the spot where they had vowed eternal love. There in the shadow of a sacred monument they fall, victims of their own hands. The oath is fulfilled.

THE FIREMAN AND THE GIRL (Whartons—Three Parts).—Larry Earle, the idol of Engine Company No. 7, decides to spend his vacation in the country. Hiram Stewart, his expectant host, calls for him at the station and they drive toward the farm. On the way their buggy meets with an accident and they are compelled to seek assistance from Sarah Lane. She makes an immediate and deep impression on Larry. While out on his subsequent trips through the country, Larry frequently meets Sarah. She tells him that she is the adopted daughter of a neighboring farmer whose son, Jim, wants to marry her. Her affections for Jim are not very encouraging to that person.

Realizing that in Larry he has a strong rival for the hand of Sarah, a fierce hatred is nurtured in the breast of Jim, who vows to rid himself of the fireman. Larry, seeing him abusing the girl, goes to her assistance. Soon the two rivals are locked in a deadly embrace. Struggling in the middle of a stream, they lose their footing and are carried by the rushing waters over the falls and along the rapids, still fighting desperately. Larry proves the victor and is compelled to go to the assistance of the exhausted Jim. He learns that Larry and the girl intend to meet the next morning to elope and enlists the aid of his father in frustrating them. They capture Sarah and conceal her in a cave in back of a waterfall. Larry misses Sarah at the appointed rendezvous and traces her to her place of concealment but sees that she is guarded by her two captors. Securing a long rope, he lowers himself over the falls and makes known his presence to the girl, whose guards have gone to watch at the entrance to the cave. They stealthily approach Jim, who, left by his father, momentarily relaxes his vigilance, and overpower him. Binding him tightly, they hasten to Larry's boarding house, where his hostess kindly loans the girl a change of raiment. Jim is found by his father, who releases him, and they prepare to overtake the firemen and his sweetheart.

Larry and Sarah have meanwhile driven to the village for the purpose of being married by the justice of the peace, who is also the sheriff. While pronouncing the final words, the pursuers are seen hurrying to the spot heavily armed. The sheriff hastily enters the buggy with the nearly married couple, and they drive for the train in an effort to evade trouble. Just as the train rolls in, the sheriff succeeds in marrying the lovers, who board it as it pulls out of the station. Jim and his father, realizing that they have been outwitted, determine to follow and wreak vengeance on the happy couple, but Cody, the sheriff, holds them back at the point of his gun.

Larry and his bride, installed in their new home, decide to ask the old man and Jim to visit them, telling them that they hold no grievances toward them. Their invitation is accepted, and Sarah meets them at the station. Guided through the streets of the city, they spy a fire-alarm box and ask Sarah regarding it. She decides to demonstrate its workings, and innocently pulls the alarm. With a clattering and banging, the fire apparatus responds to the call. Great is Larry's surprise when he learns that his bride is the cause of the false alarm. He explains the situation to his amused comrades, who decide to teach the rubes a lesson. In a moment, Sarah, sheltered by Larry's rubber coat, and the two farmers, whose only shelter is a cotton umbrella, are the centre of a veritable cloudburst, the firemen having turned all the available hose on them. After the downpour ceases the little party, drenched but forgiving, pursue a dripping course to the haven of Larry's home.

THE PERILS OF PAULINE, NO. 18.—Ensign Summers, the commander of a submarine and the inventor of a new torpedo, meeting Harry Marvin and his fiancee, Pauline, invites them to luncheon to meet his friend, Mlle. de Longeon. Owen, the wily secretary who is scheming to secure the Marvin fortune, is included in the invitation. The next day, Mlle. de Longeon is presented to the Marvin party. She is an international spy, but is unsuspected by Summers, who is in love with her. Learning from Summers that his torpedo is to be completed in two days' time, she slyly writes a note containing the information and slips it to Hako, the Japanese servant, who is also a spy employed as the naval officer's valet. During the luncheon, Mlle de Longeon learns of Owen's hatred for the lovers and decides to enlist his aid. She invites him to call, which he does the next night. She advises him that she has a plan for Pauline's demise, which Owen heartily accepts.

Hako has meanwhile reported to Namashaka, his superior. He is instructed to secure the plans of Summers' torpedo after which he must place a bomb in the submarine to destroy the original torpedo. It is planned to do this while Summers is on board. This means that Hako must also die, but the fanatical patriot is willing to perish for Nippon. At the naval ball that night, Mlle. de Longeon catches a signal from Namashaka and meets him in a secluded spot in the conservatory. Pauline, standing in the seclusion of some palms, hears the plotters talking and realizes from their conversation that some deviltry is afoot. Meeting Summers later, she asks him to take her down in the submarine next day. He agrees.

The next day Hako discovers Summers' plans and mails them to Mlle. de Longeon. He then hastens to the navy yard where the submarine is moored. Summers gives the order to sail but Hako manages to get aboard. He gives Summers a letter from Mlle. de Longeon and sneaks below while it is being read. Hako places the bomb in the pump room and hearing sailors approach, hides. The submarine is now well out in the harbor. Harry, having no faith in the submarine, follows in his motor boat. Summers orders the sinking of the submarine and soon

Harry has only its periscope to guide him. Hardly has the submarine sunk, when a terrific explosion is heard. All hands rush to the pump room where it is found that the explosion has disabled the pumps thereby preventing the raising of the boat. After a search Hako is discovered and defiantly confesses his deed. Summers realizes that they are all doomed to die. He tells Pauline that the only way to reach the surface is through the torpedo tube. She decides to risk it and crawls into the tube. Pauline wriggles out of the tube and shoots up to the surface where she is rescued by Harry, to whom she explains everything. They report the affair to the commander of the navy yard and immediate preparations are made to raise the helpless vessel. As soon as it is located, divers are sent below to place chains about the submarine, which is raised to the surface and the exhausted sailors revived. Having learned from Hako that the plans are in Mlle de Longeon's hands, they hasten to her hotel where they recover them after a fierce struggle. They then return to the navy yard where the papers are returned to their rightful owner, who overwhelms them with his gratitude.

GENERAL FILM CO.

IN THE DAYS OF THE THUNDERING HERD (Selig—Five Parts).—Tom Mingle, a pony express rider, is on his way to the settlement where Sally Madison, the daughter of a settler, has her abode with her brother, Luke, who spends his time dozing and dreaming.

The scenes in this picture are laid during the days of '49, when the intrepid frontiersmen battled with the Indians for supremacy and when the scalp of man, woman or child of the white race was the token of an Indian's bravery and right to be called a man.

Tom is in haste not only because the carrying of the mails require swiftness, but because he wants to see Sally, his sweetheart. He arrives within a short distance of the village where Sally lives when his attention is attracted by a dust cloud and the thunderous clamor of an approaching buffalo herd. He spurs his horse to reach the village before the herd passes as he does not want to be cut off, but his eagle eye discerns a swiftly moving, girlish figure running in front of the madly stampeding buffalo in an endeavor to escape them.

Tom dashes in pursuit and after a desperate and breathless struggle, seizes the exhausted girl, and dashes on just ahead of the approaching buffalo. It is not until after this has been accomplished that he recognizes Sally, who rewards his gallantry and bravery with a warmth of affection that makes him all the more in love with her.

In the village the story of the rescue is told, but it is considered an incident and of no considerable importance, because the hazards of frontier life are taken as a matter of course. Tom unstraps the mail pouch and there are letters for several of the settlers. Among them is a letter for Luke, Sally's brother. He reads it and with unconcealed fright and dismay, gives the letter to Sally. Tom helps her to read it. The letter is from Sally's father, Col. Madison, who is in the California gold fields. He writes and says that he has "made his strike" and is getting rich; that Sally's mother is very ill and Sally must reach her bedside as speedily as possible. Col. Madison appeals to his son, Luke, saying: "Remember the vow you made to bring Sally to us." He encloses a bag of gold dust.

Lazy, shiftless Luke has forgotten his promise. He reiterates the excuses which he has made to Sally before, and declines to take her to the gold fields to join their parents.

The exhibition of the bag of gold dust from the California mines, has excited the lust for riches in the breasts of all. Tom declares that he will lead Sally into this new land of promise and other settlers announce a desire to join the party. In a short time arrangements have been completed for the departure from the village of a train of fifty "prairie schooners."

At night the wagons are entrained in a circle, while sentries are posted to prevent the approach of war-like Indians. One night while Tom is acting as a sentinel, his instinct warns him of danger. As he stands by the side of a tree, alert and listening, a silent arrow wings it way within an inch of him and buries its head in the tree trunk. An Indian creeps up behind him, springs on him and they engage in a desperate hand to hand struggle until Tom, at last victorious, hurls his assailant over the precipice. He then rushes to the camp and gives the alarm.

But the Indians are there in great force. They surround the circle of wagons and dash madly around and around, shooting their bows and arrows until one after another the settlers are shot down. At last only Tom and Sally remain alive. The Indians dash into the camp and proceed to scalp their victims, while Tom and Sally pretend to be dead. Then Chief Swift Wind, who is in command of the war party, notices that the two are alive. They are taken to the camp as prisoners.

Chief Swift Wind falls in love with Sally, while Starlight, the Chief's sister, becomes enamored of Tom.

The Indians having heard great things of the prowess of intrepid Tom, determine to compel him to run the gantlet; a frightful ordeal, which consists in compelling the prisoner to dash at full speed between two lines of Indians armed with tomahawks, spears, clubs, etc. If he succeeds in running the gantlet, that is passing through the lines of Indians, he is permitted to escape. But few prisoners accomplish this.

Starlight has hidden horses where Tom can find them and notifies him of this fact before he begins running the gantlet. Tom attempts unsuccessfully to escape and take Sally with him. Their captivity continues for a long period. At times they almost succeed in getting away only to be recaptured. Chief Swift Wind tries to win Sally, while Starlight, his sister, falls in love with Tom. Were it not for these conditions both would have been slaughtered long ago.

Sally and Tom escape finally to the camp of a band of buffalo hunters, but their camp is attacked by Indians, and it seems as though they are to be "wiped out" by the redskins, until Sally, volunteering as a messenger, makes her way to another large camp of buffalo hunters and brings them to the rescue.

In the meantime, Starlight has followed the fortunes of Sally and Tom, and it is with her aid that the massacre of the party is averted. Sally and Tom make their way at last to the gold fields where her father and mother receive her with open arms and gallant Tom is awarded the prize of her hand.

THE SPY'S FATE (Lubin—Three Parts).—The Amalgamated Smelting Company, supported by the U. S. Government, have brought suit to recover $5,000,000 damages for loss of lands confiscated by Rebels in a foreign country, and the U. S. President appoints Frederick Thurston as envoy to the Arbitration Commission, who will meet at Bar Harbor to adjust the claim. The Imperial Smelters Company, the opposite side, are represented by Henri Sutro, who immediately cables to his government for the assistance of a secret service detective. Jean Thiers, a famous army spy, assisted by Madame LaRoche, are rushed to America to join Sutro. Thurston secures the aid of Jack Maher and Mary Joyce, secret service agents of America. It is then a battle of wits between the American contingent and the foreigners. Sutro and his aids meet Thurston, but accomplish nothing and set to work to secure the American documents by means fair or foul. At Washington and Bar Harbor, Thurston is watched by the foreign agents and on the other side Maher and Miss Joyce are devoting all attention to the movements of Sutro and his spies. On arrival at the Bar Harbor hotel, Thurston consigns his portfolio to the clerk, who places it in the safe. They temporarily secure an old mansion and there install Madame LaRoche. The game is on and Thiers, by adroit methods, succeeds in stealing the American State documents from the hotel safe. Madame LaRoche, preparing to leave the hotel, is coming down stairs. At the last step she trips and falls into the arms of Thurston, who is standing at the bottom; she has slightly sprained her ankle. Thurston assists her to his auto and drives her to the estate, thus an acquaintance is formed and Madame LaRoche being attracted by the envoy's charming manner, invites him to call upon her at the mansion. Another interview and Thurston and Madame LaRoche are in love. By observation, Thiers becomes suspicious of his companion and madly jealous. Having the papers, he then proposes to Lilie LaRoche that they return to Brussels, but she refuses and a quarrel ensues, which ends in Thiers begging for her pardon. He then wires to Sutro at Washington that he has secured the papers, but Maher intercepts the messenger boy, states that the message is for him and discovers the robbery. Thiers has hidden the State papers in an old vault; he then meets Thurston and asks him if he, Thurston, has not lost some important documents, and proposes to assist him in recovering same. Thurston follows Thiers to the vault and seeing his portfolio, rushes to seize it. Theirs escapes through the door and locks Thurston in. Next morning Thiers goes to the window of the vault to gloat over his prisoner. Joyce sees him and there is a struggle. Joyce being overpowered. Theirs then turns on a faucet of water which will flood the vault. The water gradually rises up to the envoy's waist and finally to his face. He is about to give up when he is rescued by Lilie, Maher and Joyce, Lilie having shot the arch fiend, Thiers. His clothes saturated with water, Thurston rushes to the Arbitration room and delivering his papers, carries the day. Lilie is released by order of the President and wins a noble husband.

LITTLE LORD FAUNTLEROY (Exclusive—Four Parts).—The earl of Dorincourt is a descendant of a long line of illustrious ancestors whose escutcheon has never been stained by dishonor of any kind. His oldest son and heir, Bevis, grows up to be a dissolute and weak-willed wastrel, while his second son, Maurice, an idle spendthrift, is little better. Only the third son, Cedric Errol, inherits the good qualities of his father. The worthlessness of his heir is the cause of great grief to the Earl. The reflection that the Earldom will descend to one who will drag the honored name of Dorincourt in the mire is so galling that it usurps every other thought in his mind. For this reason the good qualities of his gentle youngest son irritates him, and in order to get the young fellow out of his sight he sends him to America. About the same time, Bevis, tired of the dissipations of London and Paris, goes to New York in search of fresh sensations. Here he is entrapped into marriage by Minna, an adventuress, who had deserted her husband. Bevis does not know of this, neither is he aware that she has a child whom she has put out of the way by leaving it in charge of some low-class friends of hers. At home, Maurice, the second son, plunges heavily on the turf. At one race he backs the favorites and loses a very large sum. In the meantime, Cedric has married a charming American girl, and with wife and baby enjoys the delights of a happy home. But his father is prejudiced against Americans, and is convinced that Cedric has been entrapped by "a vulgar money-loving American woman." He therefore writes a letter in which he stops the allowance he has regularly sent his son. Soon after this, Maurice, the second son, meets with a fatal hunting accident in England. Four years elapse. Cedric, never robust, is now in the grip of a wasting and incurable malady. In a pathetic scene, he calls his little son to him and bids him always look after his mother. Soon after this he dies. Bevis at this time is living a fast life in Italy with Minna. As the result of his intemperance he has a sudden stroke and falls back in a fit, in which, in a few minutes, he expires. Minna wastes no time over tears, but instantly makes plans to feather her own nest. She writes to the Earl asking for funds and claiming the title of Lady Dorincourt. The old nobleman, in spite of the blows dealt him by misfortune in the deaths of all his sons, instructs his lawyer, Mr. Havisham, to fetch young Cedric, now little Lord Fauntleroy, and heir to the Earldom, from America.

Little Cedric Errol is about six years old; he has never forgotten his promise to his dead father to look after his mother. Despite the Dorincourt blood in him, Cedric has none of that empty and selfish pride which mars his grandfather's character. He has made friends with every one, and his particular chums are Mr. Hobbs, an elderly grocer; Dick, a bottblack, and his mother's Irish cook, Bridget. Mr. Havisham calls on Mrs. Errol and tells her the latter's conditions with regard to Cedric, namely, that he is to live alone with his grandfather, though at the house he will provide for her; she is to be allowed an occasional visit from him. Mrs. Errol has just learned that, owing to misappropriation of funds, her small income has almost entirely vanished, and she realizes that it will be quite impossible for her to bring up her boy in the way he should be brought up. Parting from him will be a terrible wrench, but for his sake she conquers her natural reluctance with the thought, "My husband would wish it." Cedric is sent for and introduced to Mr. Havisham, who is surprised and delighted with him, and tells him that the Earl has instructed him to satisfy any immediate wish that he (Cedric) may have. Cedric tells of the troubles of Bridget, the cook, who cannot afford medical attendance for her invalid husband. Mr. Havisham gives him money and he rushes down to the kitchen and relieves Bridget's wants. Later, Cedric, learning that he is to live alone with the Earl, remonstrates but is won over by his mother, who dilates on the many good qualities of the Earl.

Mrs. Errol and Cedric, escorted by Mr. Havisham, arrive at Dorincourt Towers. Cedric with his faculty of making instant friends gets upon good terms with a huge Newfoundland dog, which takes to him at once. The Earl unwillingly consents to see his son's widow. She delivers an unfinished letter that his son wrote him before dying, also a photograph of the young man. The old man's emotion masters him as he gazes at the photograph of the only one of his sons who had not disgraced him. To hide his feelings he blusters at Mrs. Errol, who retires with dignity after requesting permission to bid good-bye to her boy. Cedric, with that frankness which is one of his most attractive characteristics, introduces himself to the Earl, who watches him with interest, and is affected at the child's likeness to his father. Cedric, looking through the window, sees Higgins, a tenant of the estate, pleading with the butler on the lawn for permission to see the Earl. He calls the latter's attention. The old man, desiring to find out how his grandson will act, asks Cedric to call Higgins in. He then introduces Higgins to him, explaining that he has a wife and several children, all of whom have been ill. Little Lord Fauntleroy shakes Higgins by the hand sympathetically, and learning that he is worried over paying his rent, gets permission from the Earl to write to his agent telling him not to interfere with Higgins. Dinner is announced. Cedric notices that the Earl rises in pain, and offers his shoulder, saying: "Lean on me, Grandpa." The old man, desiring to test his pluck, does so; they exit. The fierce old man takes to the boy, and can hardly bear him out of his sight. One day, after returning from some riding lessons, he enters the library, where the Earl is reading a document. The little fellow is evidently worried and he lies at full length on the rug in a thoughtful attitude. Asked what he is thinking of, he responds, "I am thinking of mother." The Earl, realizing the child's love for his mother, makes her through him, a present of a brougham. Cedric, in delight, is driven off to fetch her, and takes her for a happy drive.

All this time the adventuress, Minna, has been preparing a pretty little plot. Her plans being ready, she appears with her child at Dorincourt Towers. Producing her marriage license in proof that she was actually wedded to Bevis, she boldly announces that her son is the issue of that union, and that she claims for him the title of Lord Fauntleroy. Her manner is insolent and boastful, but the Earl, though he orders her from the house, feels that she has a strong case, and is full of gloomy foreboding. The old man now realizes his love for his grandson, and the thought of seeing another take his place as little Lord Fauntleroy nearly breaks his heart. He instructs Mr. Havisham to contest Minna's claim.

The case excites much interest in the papers. One account, containing Minna's photograph, finds its way to New York, and is seen by Dick Tipton, Cedric's bootboy friend, who recognizes in it the likeness of the runaway wife of his brother, Ben. On the advice of Mr. Hobbs, he sends the newspaper cutting to Ben, who determines to leave the "Wild West," where he has made his pile, and proceed to England to regain possession of his little son. Mr. Hobbs precedes him there, and calling on the Earl, offers his entire savings towards the expense of fighting for Cedric's rights. The old nobleman is deeply touched at such disinterestedness, though he does not find it necessary to avail himself of it. In honor of Cedric's eighth birthday his grandfather gives a fete to the tenants of the estate, to which Mrs. Errol and Mr. Hobbs are invited guests. In the midst of the merry-making, Minna, accompanied by her offspring, forces her way into the grounds, bent on making a scene. She is extremely insolent to the Earl, but her tirade is interrupted by the dramatic arrival of her husband, Ben, who exposes the fraudulency of her case and claims his son. The Earl invites Mrs. Errol to take up her residence permanently under his roof, and thus peace and happiness come to Dorincourt at last.

THE EDUCATION OF MR. PIPP (All Star).—The members of a Pittsburgh family are trying to break into society through the million dollars obtained by their father's selling his business to the Steel Trust. They move to New York, establish themselves in a Fifth avenue residence, and backed by the father's money endeavor to penetrate New York society. The mother in her ambition engages a bogus French nobleman to teach herself and her daughters the French language. This Frenchman is in reality one of a group of crooks.

The elder daughter at Durland's meets a young riding master named Fitzgerald, and it is a case of love at first sight. The young riding master is in reality Lord Fitzmaurice, son of an old English family. The younger daughter is desperately fond of John Willing, who has been her father's manager in his Pittsburgh business and who has been established in the bank that her father presides over in New York City. The family decides to make a trip to England. Just before they leave, the French teacher is given a check for $75 in payment for his lessons and he in connection with the other two members of his band raises this check to $75,000 and gets it cashed while the Pipps are on the liner bound for Europe.

John Willing and young Fitzmaurice meet and learn of each other's feelings towards the two Pipp girls. Willing suspects that the check is bad and gets in touch with Mr. Pipp by cable. On learning that the check is a forgery, he engages Pinkerton to assist in recovering the $75,000, and young Fitzmaurice decides to accompany them. Mrs. Pipp has a letter of introduction to Lady Viola, the mother of young Fitzgerald, and the Pipps go to her home for a visit. Pinkerton and the two young men arrive in England shortly and also go to the Fitzmaurice home.

The young Lord gets his mother and the servants to keep his identity a secret and many fine scenes of mistaken identity and cross purposes are the result. The crooks are finally located in Paris and the Pipps, accompanied by Pinkerton, go there. Two of the band try to steal a valuable tiara from Mrs. Pipp, and one of them, Count Charmarot, attempts the life of Mr. Pipp with poison thinking that with him out of the way there is an opportunity for him to make love to and marry the impressionable Mrs. Pipp.

Pinkerton, with the assistance of the French Prefect of Police, blocks their plans and brings about their arrest. Mrs. Pipp, realizing the mistake she has made, begs Mr. Pipp to take her back to Pittsburgh. The love affairs of the young people are sucessfully carried on and end in happy marriages.

PARAMOUNT.

THE MAN FROM HOME (Lasky-Lieber—Five Parts).—Pike, a country lawyer, loves Ethel, daughter of a very rich farmer. Simpson, wishing his children, Ethel and her brother, Horace, to be well educated, sends them to Europe. Simpson meets with an accident which causes his death. Pike is appointed guardian of Ethel and Horace. Lord Hawcastle and his son, St. Aubyn, a nonentity, are in Russia, where Hawcastle is selling hydraulic machinery to the government. He meets Ivanoff, an under clerk in the Russian government service, who is stealing government money and is giving it to a revolutionary society. Hawcastle meets Ivanoff's beautiful wife, Helen. They fall in love with each other and decide to elope. Fearing Ivanoff's vengeance, if left at large, they betray him to the Russian government. He is arrested, tried and sent to the mines of Siberia for thirty years.

Ethel and Horace arrive in Sorrento, Italy, where they meet the Hawcastles, who are out of funds. Ethel and Horace are greatly flattered by the attentions of the Hawcastles, who become possessed of the knowledge that Ethel is an heiress. Through Hawcastle's efforts, she becomes engaged to St. Aubyn. Ethel and Horace have become snobs. Overjoyed at this great fortune of marrying a title, Ethel writes Pike, telling him all about it. Upon receipt of her letter, Pike leaves for Italy, and arrives in the environs of Sorrento. Here he meets the Grand Duke Vacili of Russia, who is traveling incognito. The Duke's auto his stopped for repairs when Pike rides up in a donkey car. Pike hitches himself to the side of the donkey and draws the auto into the courtyard of the hotel, much to the amusement of the Hawcastles and Ethel's chagrin. The Grand Duke is taken with Pike's ways and they become friendly.

Several years have passed with Ivanoff in the mines of Siberia. After an explosion, Ivan escapes and makes his way across the continent to the Austrian frontier and into Sorrento, Italy. He finds his way, quite by accident, into the hotel courtyard, pursued by the Italian police. Pike, by a ruse, throws them off the track, and they leave. Hawcastle threatens to expose Pike and the Grand Duke, in order to force Pike's consent to Ethel's marriage to St. Aubyn. It is a penal offense to harbor an escaped convict. Pike is dismayed.

The Grand Duke leaves with his servant, sees the captain of police and returns with him to the hotel, where they find that Hawcastle has called in the police. Ivanoff recognizes his wife and Hawcastle and tries to avenge himself. The Grand Duke's servant discloses his master's identity. The Grand Duke secures a pardon for Ivanoff. The Hawcastles find themselves checkmated and take their departure. Ethel wakes up to realize her narrow escape. In the presence of Pike all shallow pretenses fall away and Ethel is once more the sweet little girl that he loves, and who loves him, and there is the perfect hour.

ROSE OF THE RANCHO (Lasky-Belasco—Five Parts).—In the year of 1850, when the government at Washington decreed that all ranch owners must register their properties, the Spanish rancheros of California, already seemingly humiliated by coming under the rule of the hated "Gringos," refused to comply and a system of land jumpers roamed about, and chief among these was one Kincaid of Nebraska. The government, learning of the land jumping, and that the illicit trade was growing, sent Kearney, a secret agent, to California to investigate.

Kincaid, a worthless and conscienceless scoundrel, learns from one of his men that Senor Espinoza, a rich Spanish Ranchero, has vowed that he will never register his land, and, seizing the opportunity, Kincaid and his men ride down on the Espinoza family when they are at dinner. Ignoring protests and refusing cash, Kincaid takes possession of the ranch, and Isabelita, the eldest daughter, is captured by a half breed, who while fighting for possession of the girl, mortally wounds Espinoza, and Isabelita, knowing her fate at the hands of the Indian, kills herself. Kincaid and his men then sit at the table and shake dice to decide the possession of the other two Espinoza girls.

Kearney and his two colored boys arrive. Riding across country on the way to Old Monterey, Kearney encounters Juanita (Wanita), the rose of the Castro Ranch. Using the pretext of a stranger, mutually attracted to each other, the one asks the way to Monterey and the other gives the direction. Juanita, although engaged to the rich Don Luis, continues her flirtation with Kearney. Kearney, learning of the Kincaid raid on the Espinoza ranch, goes to warn Juanita. Juanita takes the warning in an indifferent manner and her mother, a high strung Spanish woman of the Continental school, seeing Kearney accept a flower from Juanita, refuses to take Kearney's advice to register her ranch, and orders him from the place. Kearney sees Kincaid surveying the Castro Ranch and goes to the Padre at the mission house and begs him to use his influence with the Castros to prevail upon them to register their ranch boundaries.

To church, through the Padre's garden, comes Juanita, and though she has vowed never to speak to the Americano again, the Padre, convinced of Kearney's sincerity and honesty, brings them together. Although Juanita refuses to register the ranch, she coquettes with Kearney and Kearney impulsively seizes her and presses a kiss on her lips. All coquettry vanishes and Juanita admits she loves the dashing Gringo. Don Luis, who witnesses the pretty scene, rushes to Castro Rancho and tells Juanita's mother. Kearney wins Kincaid's friendship, learns that he intends seizing the Castro ranch. Prevails upon Juanita to secure the papers, rushes to the Registry office and returns in time to participate in Juanita's betrothal dance.

Juanita implores Don Luis to give her up, but he steadfastly refuses. Kearney arrives at the Castro ranch in time to meet Kincaid, who is about to raid it. Pretending friendship he is enabled to delay the raid. Juanita mistakes Kearney's attitude as being against her family. Kearney succeeds in delaying Kincaid until soldiers arrive, a terrible fight ensues and Kincaid and his men are overcome just as they are about to seize Kearney and the Castros. Kearney and Juanita are married quietly by the Padre and all ends with a beautiful scene in the Padre's garden as it began there.

ARISTOCRACY (Famous Players — Four Parts).—Jefferson Stockton, of San Francisco, president of The Transcontinental Railway Company, loves his work, and is proud of his success, but is still fonder and prouder of his pretty daughter Virginia, and his beautiful young wife, Diana, Virginia's stepmother. The Stuart-Lawrences of New York, members of the old "Knickerbocker Aristocracy," are also fond and proud of each other, but perhaps prouder still of the blue blood that runs in their veins, and when they hear that their son Stuyvesant is engaged to Virginia Stockton of San Francisco, daughter of a family of "rich nobodies," father Lawrence immediately takes the train West to put a stop to the affair. Virginia has another suitor, the Marquis of Normandale, a poor but titled Englishman, but when he proposes for the hand of Virginia, Jefferson Stockton laughs at his pretensions but tells him that he will enter into another business agreement with the Marquis. He contracts to take the Marquis' house in London, with servants, furniture, and the Marquis, himself for a handsome sum on a year's lease. The needy nobleman consents, and the papers are signed, for Stockton, wishing to satisfy his wife's love and ambition for society, knows that the entrance to New York's fashionable circle is best gained through the gateway of Europe, and intends to stay there until his beautiful home in New York has been finished. Then, equipped with the prestige given by foreign residence and titled acquaintances they will be able to take their place among the aristocracy of the great American metropolis, for which the beautiful Diana so longs. The elder Lawrence arrives in San Francisco and interviews both his son and Stockton, denying his consent to the betrothal, upon which both Stockton and his daughter agree that the engagement had better be temporarily cancelled. With aching heart, Stuyvesant takes his departure for New York and the unhappy little Virginia goes to Europe with her people both living only until the time when Stuyvesant may be able to win his parents over. But Stuyvesant's mother intercepts Virginia's letters to her son and at length his letters to Virginia cease, each thinking the other faithless. Diana is for a time radiantly happy in the baronial halls of the Marquis, while Stockton views her pleasure with fond amusement, though immensely bored by it all himself. A friend of the Marquis, Prince Emil Von Haldenwald, a penniless roue, falls in love with Diana, and she feels the strange magnetism of his keen and admiring gaze, even while she resents it. The Prince sues for the hand of Virginia, who, believing he loves her and that Stuyvesant is to be married to another consents, and they are married, against the wish

One reel comedies are in high popular favor and the demand is growing greater every day.

Yet of all forms of photoplay the short comedy is the most difficult to produce.

MinA Films are the result of careful study and long preparation for this especial work, backed up by years of successful experience in the production of every style of picture.

Not a word was said about the time and money and effort being spent in the perfecting of MinA Films until they had reached the heartbreaking standard set by their producer.

Early in September that high mark had been surpassed and as proof of their extraordinary merit, MinA Films were added to the regular licensed program and,—commencing on Thursday, December 17th, the first weekly release will be made through the of Stockton. The night of the marriage Virginia hears that Stuyvesant is in Europe and is still true to her, learning of the interception of her letters, too late! While the Prince's ruined estates are being repaired Virginia and he live with the Stocktons, and one night, during the absence of Stockton, the Prince enters the room of Diana, and attempts to embrace her. Half-hypnotized, she struggles weakly, when they hear the return of Stockton. The Prince hides on the balcony, but is discovered by Stockton, who sends him from their home. The happiness of the Stocktons seem shattered, but the hand of a kindly Fate at length lifts the pall of unhappiness that European aristocracy has spread for them and the drama has a happy ending.

THE LAST DANCE (Five Parts).—Jean, a poor struggling artist, living in a garret on Montmartre, sees from the gallery of the Opera House the famous Spanish dancer, Conchita, and falls madly in love with her. He haunts the street before her house, in the hopes of even a glimpse of her wonderful beauty, but try as he may, cheered on by his faithful model, Ninon, he cannot paint the picture that will do her justice. Conchita progresses from triumph to triumph, and wears the night of her greatest success the poor flowers sent her by the artist in preference to the jewels of her admiring host of friends. Ninon goes to Conchita and begs her to pose just once as Jean's model, so that he may paint her portrait and gain undying fame.

Conchita, lured on by her spirit of romance, visits the artist in his studio while he is asleep and dances before him. She seems to float away into nothingness and he cannot tell whether the loving kiss that she gave him was real or only a dream. The picture that Jean paints from the inspiration of the dancer wins the prize at the Academy, and Jean has become famous over night. The romance is soon ended when the quickly acquired fortune of the now famous painter is dissipated, and the dancer returns to the stage. Jean is broken in health, and comes to live again in an obscure garret, tenderly cared for by the ever faithful Ninon, and on her desperate plea, Conchita comes to dance before the dying Jean. He dies in her arms and she, now realizing that the world holds no further zest, follows him into the unknown.

ZUDORA (Episode No. 2—The Mystery of the Sleeping House—Two Parts).—A far Eastern story is transplanted the tribal feud is carried to this country. It is a story of savage mastery for the heart of a Princess, the beauty to whom all the tribes of the Indian back hills have turned for years as they would to their native gods. This Princess, following an uprising, is kidnapped by the victorious tribe and brought a captive to America. The terrific struggle of the tribes for the pass guarding the hillside home of the Princess, the yielding by one side and the pressing on of these whom fortune favored presents an awe-inspiring scene, yet gigantic and grim enough to have for its stake the beautiful Princess. In the new found home the Prince, captor of the fair girl, establishes himself in all the regal splendor and pomp sacredly necessary to the native heart. The tribal idol the god Ganesh, is transplanted too, and under his sheltering presence the victorious tribe plans to live long and prosper.

A throne room of gigantic size modeled after the seat of the mighty Prince in faraway India is built, the famed rugs, vases and ornaments of his court are set in place. Even the dancing girls who perform daily to the witchery of the native instruments test the rugs with their dainty feet and throw into their dance the old abandon of their far Eastern home. The native minions guard the joyous scene, as their master, the Prince, and his captive, the Princess, gaze upon the scene. He, with the eye of one who has triumphed and is now reaping reward of victory; she, as though all hope had fled and her young life shattered as the waves are turned into a vanishing mist, by the great rocks of the Indian sea. All is gay save the troubled look on the fair face of the Princess. Somewhere there is a man, also a Prince, who is striving and planning to free her from the restraining hand of her captor.

For it is this Prince she loves. Loves him with all the fervor of her clime born, and it is of him she is thinking as the music of the dance she has noticed dies away; the singing ceases and quiet returns. She knows her lover is loyal and daring. And her belief is not misplaced, for even as the tribe turns in final adoration of their Prince, one of the leaders sways from side to side, then falls heavily to the floor. Then a dancer succumbs and another, until finally all, even the Princess, has fallen a victim to the unknown power and lie helpless as in a trance.

Then from the base of the massive idol Ganesha there appears a head and it is the comely face of the real lover of the Princess that stands suddenly out from the sweeping clouds of smoke enveloping the idol. When the tribe recovers from the strange sleep, the crestfallen captor of the Princess summons Hassam Ali, famed mystic detective, to investigate the case and try to determine what person was responsible for the sudden visitation of sleep. And, too, Zudora, niece of Hassam Ali, comes into the case for her uncle has said that if she solve twenty cases she can wed the man of her choice, and that man being John Storm. So they visit the headquarters of the tribe and again comes the terrible visitation—the tribe falling into a helpless sleep. Meantime Storm searches for Zudora, compelling Hassam Ali's servant to guide him to the home of the tribe. Arrived there he enters just as the tribe is recovering from the second attack of sleep, and an accusing finger is pointed at him which sends him to a dungeon with closing walls.

Zudora then begins her work of investigation. She finds a lotus leaf and puzzled at its presence examines the idol Ganesh and hears voices below. Descending into the cellar beneath the tribal headquarters she comes upon a dozen natives of a different tribe than those in the rooms above. They seize her and are about to put her to death when the hand of the leader stays the violently inclined. Zudora tells her mission and how she desires to aid the young Princess and again foil the hypocritical mystic uncle. The leader then tells her he is the real lover of the Princess and that he had devised a solution of lotus leaves which made a powerful sleep producing distillation, and this was the secret of the sleeping house. So again a furnace beneath the god Ganesha is fed and the fumes mounting upward are sent out through the nostrils of the idol and once more the tribe falls into a curious sleep. Then Zudora leads the friends of the Princess up above and out of the mass of sleeping natives they drag forth the Princess.

They battle with the natives who had been aroused, but to no purpose, and the Princess is restored to the arms of her lover. Then Zudora hears plaintive cries of distress. She recognizes the voice, though never raised in such anguish before. It is the voice of John Storm. She leads her new found friends through a long low areaway and there a huge native is turning a wheel which is bringing together the walls of the chamber in which Storm is imprisoned. The guard is dealt with in summary fashion and the great walls marching slowly to Storm's death are halted. Zudora rushes in and drags forth her sweetheart. The Princess is reunited to her real lover and Zudora again proves her skill at foiling her uncle and bringing herself one step nearer to marital bliss.

UNIVERSAL SPECIAL RELEASE.

THE MASTER KEY (Three Parts—Released Week of Nov. 16).—Two mining prospectors, James Gallon and his partner, Wilkerson, in a temporary camp, have been searching for gold. Gallon has made a lucky strike and has tried to conceal the fact from Wilkerson, who already suspects his partner is not giving him a square deal.

The partners are sitting around the campfire one evening when suddenly Wilkerson becomes thirsty; after taking innumerable drinks of water, he falls asleep. Gallon walks off some distance from the sleeper and starts drawing the plans of his great find—but every now and again he furtively turns his eyes in the direction of Wilkerson, fearing he may awaken and discover his secret.

Wilkerson awakens, observes Gallon and wonders what he is doing. Quietly he crawls on his hands and knees until he can peer over Gallon's shoulder; and in his eagerness to see he accidentally touches him. Gallon discovers Wilkerson is looking at him, and starts running away, with Wilkerson in pursuit. Gallon grabs his gun, turns and fires at Wilkerson. A terrific fight follows. Gallon leaves Wilkerson apparently dead.

Gallon, after hours of wandering, reaches the small mining town of Jacito. A stranger takes him to the sheriff's office. Gallon tells the sheriff he and his patrner were attacked by outlaws and his partner was killed.

The sheriff, accompanied by his deputy and Gallon, goes toward the saloon and calls for volunteers. A crowd soon collects. Out of the saloon comes a half drunken boy, who cries, "I'm game," jumps on a horse—and the posse are off.

As they gallop up the hill, the drunken boy is thrown to the ground when his horse stumbles. The others ride on. The boy lies dazed. His horse gets upon its feet and whinnies.

"Who's coming?" mutters the boy. Through the brush he distinguishes a faint form; it is a man. Could this be one of the outlaws? he wonders. He pulls his revolver.

"I'm Wilkerson," replies the voice. Wilkerson confides his story to the boy and asks his help. The boy consents and the two go slowly on.

At the camp, the sheriff and deputy find no one. The sheriff returns and orders Gallon's arrest. The boys bind him. Evening comes on the posse camp, leaving Gallon tied by the fire. A cowboy is left on watch. In time the watcher falls asleep. Gallon manages to sever his bonds by holding his hands over the fire. He manages to get to a horse and escape. The posse pursue him. Gallon has reached the thick brush, and when he knows he is safe he lies down and takes out the plans he had drawn, also a picture of a twelve-year-old girl, his only daughter—Ruth—and with that pic clasped tightly to his heart he falls asleep, muttering, "I'll save 'The Master Key' for Ruth."

Fearing to return to the scene of his supposed crime, Gallon leaves San Francisco by ship for his home. Visions of Wilkerson appear before him. His conscience is troubled. Shortly after boarding the ship, he finds an old sea chest, which he opens. He takes out a curious Japanese idol. In the head of this he hides the plan to his mine.

The captain of the vessel is a brute. Once out to sea a mutiny ensues, during which the ship catches fire. Shortly after it sinks. Gallon is washed ashore. Realizing he has nothing to indicate the location of the disaster, he engraves the approximate longitude and latitude where the ship went down on the key to the chest, known afterward as "The Master Key." Later, he is rescued and returns home, where he meets his daughter, Ruth.

Five years ansue. Gallon returns to the mines, which he begins developing. He keeps a diary, and in this writes a notation to the effect that he has been seeking for the secret of his lost plans.

About this time Gallon writes to a New York stock broker, named Gates, asking him for advice relative to floating "The Master Key" mines. On the day Gates receives Gallon's letter, John Dore, a young mining engineer, calls upon the former and is engaged as consulting and construction engineer for Gallon. He goes West to take up his work. Here he meets Gallon's daughter.

Gallon takes his diary from his safe and writes:

"This day has been a repetition of all those gone before for the past five years. I am still seeking for the secret of my lost plans. I had not yet discovered—"

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY (Episode Twenty-two—Reels Forty-three and Forty-four).—The conspirators redouble their efforts to recover the mysterious documents after their loss and Braine's narrow escape from capture by Jones and Norton at the bridge. Spies are constantly to be seen on the Hargreave grounds, there are many conferences of the gang at their rendezvous in the cave and Braine and the Countess Olga strive desperately to form some adequate plan which will head off the imminent danger to their schemes. Old Jones, the butler, also makes many trips between the Hargreave mansion and some mysterious place, where he holds many consultations with Henri Servan, the Russian minister of police and another party, whose identity is concealed.

Realizing their danger the conspirators determine on a desperate plan. It is nothing less than the capture of Norton or Jones. A taxi, which is driven by one of the gang, lays in wait, and Norton, coming from a visit to Florence, falls into the trap. But he has not proceeded far when the discovery of a black masque on the floor of the car enlightens him as to the real designs of the chauffeur. As they come in sight of a policeman, Norton nonchalantly orders the man to stop and then before the other is aware of his designs has him placed under arrest. After a brief struggle the three proceed to the station house, where the reporter lays before the lieutenant on duty the information he has about the gang, and asks for a detail to aid him in raiding their headquarters in the cave. Previously posted by Servan, the official quickly acquiesces and a squad of bluecoats are placed at Norton's disposal. With them the reporter goes to the cave and surrounds it. Then while some of the policemen enter the cave from the water side the rest of the raiders wait at the other entrance until the conspirators are driven out. There is a short, sharp battle, in which Norton's dog, Shep, plays no small part, and all the gang are rounded up and placed in cells at the police station. Braine and the Countess Olga, however, are not among them.

Meanwhile much has been happening at the Hargreave mansion. Old Jones' frequent trips to and fro have been closely tallied, and on his return from a short absence, he is accompanied by a tall, gaunt man, whose cleanshaven features bear a strange resemblance to the venerable butler's. The Countess Olga, who has been concealed on the grounds with another of the gang's scouts, hastens to Braine.

Come quickly," she says pantingly. "Our time has come. Hargreave has returned. He has just entered the house." Forcing her way in, the Countess thrusts herself into the library, where Florence and her friend Susan are seated. "Where is your father?" she demands. "He is in this house. I must see him." Florence quickly takes a pistol from the desk drawer. "Leave this house at once," she commands.

But the Countess, although at bay, is not so easily to be balked. With a catlike leap she has sprung upon Florence and wrested the weapon from her just as Jones and his mysterious companion enter. Threatening them with the pistol the Countess runs to the stairs, just as Braine, coming to her aid, clambers in at the window. The Countess, seeking to aid her comrade, fires from the staircase. But instead of wounding the butler or his companion, her bullet finds its refuge in Braine's heart.

With a cry of horror, the Countess flees to a room above, while her late ally sinks lifeless to the floor. There she hesitates between using her last cartridge on herself or casting herself from the window. In the confusion in the room below, Norton is seen to enter. Florence has flung her arms around the newcomer's neck, while Jones and Susan stand silently by.

"Father—dear father." Norton hears her sob. Then he hears the other say, "Now I shall tell you the secret of 'The Million Dollar Mystery.'"

SAWYER.

THE TYRANNY OF THE MAD CZAR (Four Parts).—The story of the Mad Czar deals with a historical subject, the accession to the throne of Russia in 1796 of Paul the First, son of Catherine (sub-named the "Great") and his subsequent meteoric career which ended in his assassination in 1801.

The Mad Czar from the moment of his ascent to the throne displayed eccentricities which progressed into a malady of such pronounced type as to gain for him his nickmane of the Mad Czar.

This progression is shown in the various stages of its development through startlingly vivid incidents, such as plucking out by the roots the beard of an officer, the striking down in front of the regiment one of his most faithful officers, his childish sticking out his tongue in the midst of important social gatherings, his ridicule of the representatives of the church and many other incidents. It is to these incidents and many others of similar nature that the undoing of Paul was brought about.

Count Pahlen Chief of Police of St. Petersburg was the arch conspirator in the Czar's overthrow. He gathered about him a cabal of officers representing the various corps in the service and disseminated among them the seed which later found fruit in the Czar's assassination in 1801. The clever manner in which the Count succeeded in inveigling Prince Alexander into the plot against his father is perfectly depicted. The love of the Countess Anna for the Mad Czar and her wonderful influence over the mad man furnishes a deep tragic and sympathetic throb for his misfortunes.

HEPWORTH.

THROUGH THE VALLEY OF SHADOWS (Turner—Four Parts).—Dr Cross is so absorbed in his profession that his young wife, Alice, is left practically without any companionship beyond that of her dog, Jean. With nothing to occupy her mind, she becomes desperately lonely, but when she seeks to enter more fully into her husband's life he puts her off, pleading the importance of his work, and tells her to go about more with friends of her own age. Following his advice, Alice joins some acquaintances who are rehearsing an amateur dramatic performance, and there meets with Oscar Mailling, a matinee idol, who is assisting them in the production of their play. Under the excuse of teaching her how to play her part, Mailling covertly makes violent love to her.

Awakening to the danger of their intimacy, Alice decides that she must see no more of Mailling, but shortly afterwards she receives word that he is coming to call upon her. Fearing his influence, she pleads with her husband to abandon his work for this one occasion and spend the afternoon with her, but he cannot understand why his work should be interrupted, and lightly puts her off by giving her extra money to spend.

On the platform, while waiting for the arrival of his train, Dr. Cross buys a paper, and in glancing over it, comes across the following paragraph: "We wonder what a certain doctor will do when he hears of the affair between his wife and a well-known actor, especially as the latter does not hesitate to boast of his latest conquest at the club." The bearing of the paragraph on his own case immediately strikes him; he is unwilling to harbor suspicion of his wife, but he cannot dispel the uneasy thought which has suddenly dawned upon him that his neglect may have driven her to seek consolation elsewhere.

Reluctantly he returns home, only to find his wife in Mailling's arms, and to overhear the details of their proposed elopement. Dumbfounded by his discovery, he enters the room and confronts them. At first they both uphold the pretense that they have been merely rehearsing for another play, but this does not deceive Dr. Cross, and he demands that Alice choose between himself and Mailling. When Mailling hears that she cares more for him than for her husband, his true character is revealed. Instead of standing by her, he disclaims all responsibility and puts the blame entirely on the woman. The doctor controls his temper, and allows Mailling to leave the house.

Alice now sees the true character of the two men, and, without attempting to condone her own fault, tries to explain to her husband that through his apparent neglect of her she has come to believe that he did not love her. But he will not hear her out. He breaks into a storm of passionate denunciation, and tells her he wishes he had never seen her face. She leaves his home.

At the end of her resources, and lacking a practical education, she seeks employment in the theater. In this work she cannot avoid meeting Mailling, who renews his attention. She tells him, however, that she would rather starve than accept any favor at his hands, and out of pique, he sees to it that as far as theatrical engagements are concerned this would be her fate. She is finally reduced to such casual work as she can procure in the sweater's dens.

After a time Dr. Cross realizes that he is perhaps equally to blame for the estrangement, and does all in his power to trace his wife. He is finally driven to making an appeal to Mailling, who not only lies in disclaimng knowledge of her whereabouts, but gives him the impression that, in view of her life with others, Alice would welcome neither his own nor the doctor's attentions.

A year passes, and Dr. Cross, unable to remain longer amid the surroundings that so continually remind him of his wife, takes Jean and leaves that house that was once his home, and devotes himself to charity work.

Meanwhile Alice is driven from her work in the sweater's shop to avoid the coarse attentions of the foreman of the shops. She wanders along the Thames and is only saved from ending her troubles by the intervention of an actress, who gives her food and shelter. The actress then introduces her to the producer at the moving picture studio. He sees in her possibilities, and allots her a leading part in the photoplay about to be made.

This play tells the story of a young married woman who was lured from her home by a man of the world, and afterwards deserted by him. The climax is reached when the villain of the piece, accompanied by a society lady on a "slumming" expedition, meets his victim in a garret. Taunted by him beyond endurance, the grief-stricken woman is supposed to stab him in the heart. The man chosen to play the villain's part is Oscar Mailling. The shock of the meeting, and the fact that Mailling plays his part to character whose circumstances are so similar to her own.

Mailling's sneers, coupled with the producer's advice to let herself go and play the part as if it were her own case, goad her to desperation, and when the time comes for the fatal thrust, the knife goes home. Amid the consternation and confusion which ensues, on the discovery of what appears to be purely an accident, Alice takes refuge in her dressing room. The nearest doctor is called, and proves to be no other than her husband, who recognizes the wounded man, but by prompt action saves his life. He is then called to attend to Alice.

The doctor's joy at finding his wife is short-lived, for she collapses and becomes unconscious as the result of the strain. He removes her to his home, where, under his tender care, she is brought safely through the valley of shadows.

CHILDREN OF THE JUNGLE (Three Parts).—A young man studying the many species of monkeys in their habitats is alone in an African village where he hires a native guide to pilot him through the jungle. On the afternoon of his first day out he is surprised at finding the home of an old American and his daughter. Our sympathy goes at once to the young girl, who has grown to womanhood in this secluded spot; she is devoted to her father, who has been her sole companion since early childhood, and has taught her to observe and learn much about the inhabitants of the primative jungle. This knowledge leads to an association with the young American student, which culminates in a pleasing romance.

In searching for rare specimens not found in the mainland, the three go to an uninhabited island of the coast. The natives they have with them become frightened at a mysterious character that appears at the camp, and they desert the party in the dead of night, taking the boat with them. The natives and boat are lost in a storm and our three friends have no means of communication with the world. After three years we find them still on the island and they have made friends with the mysterious character that seems half man and half ape. All goes well until the ape man's pet, a chimpanzee of the jungle, steals the two-year-old baby and bestows on it almost human devotion. It is only through the powers of the ape man that the child is rescued. Signal fires finally attract a ship and the persons are thereby rescued.

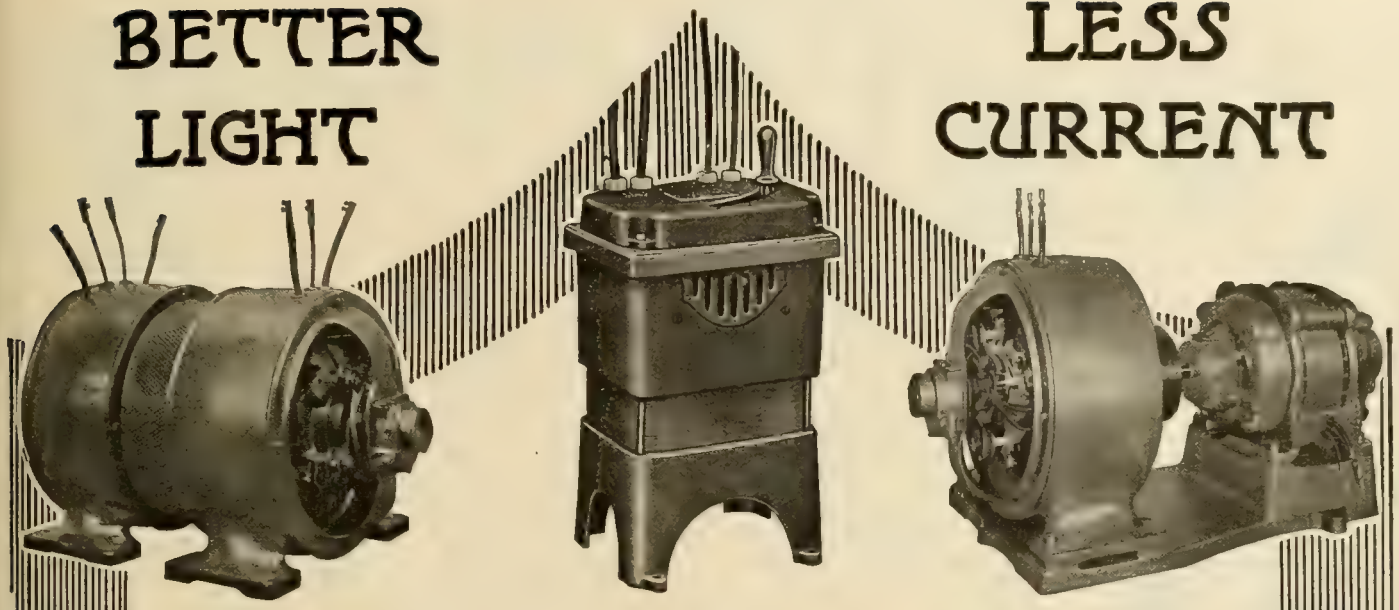
BETTER LIGHT LESS CURRENT



The DC Compensarc lowers the voltage of a direct current supply to that required at the lamp without needless waste.

The AC Compensarc cuts ⅔ from your lighting bill if you use alternating current.

The AC to DC Compensarc will transform alternating into direct current and reduce the voltage at the same time without needless waste.

No matter what current you have---Alternating or Direct---or what voltage or frequency, one of the will enable you to secure a light that will give those clear, bright pictures that everybody now demands.

What's the use of paying extra money for special screens, projecting machines, and first run films and then spoil the whole result with poor light? With the Fort Wayne Compensarcs you can get any kind of light you want regardless of the kind or quality of your current supply.

The Compensarcs will give you

STEADY LIGHT. No flickering, no sputtering, even when changing intensities or from one machine to another.

WHITE LIGHT. No yellow streaks, no ghosts.

BRIGHT LIGHT. Three times the light with two-thirds the current.

They are safe, efficient, easy to operate, fool proof and reliable.

Compensarcs are so commonly found in motion picture theatres that many people now call all current saving and transforming devices by that name.

"The Truest, Sweetest Story Ever Told"

Appears in the* UNIVERSAL WEEKLY *of Nov. 14, 1914, on page 9. Here is a bit of it:

"And now comes the screen. As has been the custom of the Universal company, every effort has been made to secure the best results possible in the way of projecting appliances. After listening to the claims of various screen manufacturers and putting their products to the acid test, it was decided to install the wonderful screen called "The Day and Night Screen." A remarkable experiment showed that where previously it had been necessary to use thirty-five amperes of current, the same results could now be obtained with fifteen amperes, a reduction of 50 per cent. The pictures were even richer in the clearness of detail and the manner in which the delicate tintings and tonings of the film were brought out was as satisfactory as one could wish. Moreover, the pictures appear to be absolutely unaffected by turning up the overhead and side lights. This is mentioned in the interest of the exhibitor, who aims for perfect projection. The Universal selected it, for the same reason that all their equipment is selected, because they believe it to be the best, and the best is none too good when perfect results are obtainable."

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

He is in Direct Touch With More Editors Than Any Other Man in America

He knows the editor and business manager of every newspaper published in cities above 20,000. He has talked with them several times annually for many years.

One at a time he calls on them—always to discuss interesting the people. Publicity is his specialty and your need.

For two years he was syndicate manager of the Chicago Tribune and also its Sunday Editor. Then, he made newspaper stars of Lillian Russell and Laura Jean Libby; he syndicated the political writings of Finley Peter Dunne and Sam Blythe; he secured national audiences for Jim Corbett and "Mr. Dooley." To cut the list short, the greater number of important new features in American journalism have been nationalized by A. P. Robyn.

He is now retained by A. P. Robyn Syndicate to specialize as an aid to Motion Picture Producers. He placed "Kathlyn" and "Lucile" in newspapers throughout the country. He schemed and secured the publicity for the "Trey O' Hearts."

The newspapers know he has no use for dead ones. He has kept their respect for his endorsements by giving them service.

If you have an important idea for a feature, confer with him.

A Phenomenal Success!

Thanhouser's Greatest Photoplay

The first episode of Zudora was released Nov. 23rd. The tremendous enthusiasm that greeted Episode No. 1 at the theatres in New York, Chicago and in other cities throughout America stamps this newest Thanhouser production a phenomenal success.

It is only natural that a photoplay created and written by two such noted authors as Harold MacGrath and Daniel Carson Goodman, should meet with pronounced success. This stupendous serial is now running at the better theatres. The story is appearing in the biggest metropolitan newspapers. Such wonderful cooperation and a play of extraordinary merit have made this Thanhouser's GREATEST Photoplay.

An exceptional cast including Marguerite Snow, Harry Benham and James Cruze interpret this play with all the effects which the authors intended. The entire production will take 20 episodes of 2 reels each. A new episode is being released each week. Exhibitors who are seeking a powerful box office attraction can arrange Zudora bookings by applying to the Thanhouser-Syndicate representative at any Mutual Exchange in America. Zudora is an independent release and may be obtained regardless of the regular program being used. Book NOW!

—That Universal Program, believing there is no program on earth that contains comedies which surpass its new L-KO (Pathe Lehrman-Billie Ritchie) comedy releases, makes this broad challenge:

—Take "THE MANICURE GIRL," L-KO's latest production (released Sunday, December 27th, which gives you time to make arrangements) and take any comedy from any other program, PLAY THE TWO OF THEM THE SAME DAY, placing whichever one you please first, and get a vote from your audience on which comedy they liked the most!

—The other comedy needn't be a new one. We are willing that you take your pick of any of the comedy "classics" of the entire last six months, or of the entire past year, if you wish. Under the present "open market" condition of things you will have no trouble booking the rival comedy from the lists of any manufacturer and from any program. YOU HAVE THE COMEDY OUTPUT OF THE WORLD TO CHOOSE FROM. Pit your pick against "THE MANICURE GIRL," and we know you're L-KO's, Pathe Lehrman's, Billie Ritchie's and Universal's booster for life!

We want you to be a Universal booster and we want you to accept this remarkable Universal challenge QUICK!

—Remember, we told you we were sending HOMER CROY, the famous "Puck" humorist, to the Orient with a camera? He was to film the unusual things his unusual vision took in. WELL, HE HAS. And he's back with these unusual film-observations and we issue the first lot, called "HERE AND THERE IN CHINA," with the Nestor comedy of December 18th. Fight for it!

—Remember, we told you other producers would follow in Universal's footsteps with "night photography?" Aren't you glad you took our tip and became the pioneer exhibitor of "night photography" in your town with 101-Bison's "Brand of His Tribe?" It's good prestige to be a pioneer, isn't it?

—Remember, we told you there was only one "ANIMATED WEEKLY" and that you would yet have to come to it? WELL, HAVEN'T YOU?

—You can rack your brains for days and days and days, you can search every list of "war specials" from beginning to end and end to beginning, and you simply will not find a more timely feature than "THE SUBMARINE SPY" (Imp re-issue out Dec. 28th) which deals with that new-fangled war engine, the submarine. A genuine submarine is used throughout the film. The spectator is taken into the very heart of the little vessel that can deal death and destruction to the most gigantic battleship afloat. And he sees with his own eyes the desperate chances the little crew takes of an accident to the air connections! YOU HOLD YOUR BREATH ALMOST EVERY MINUTE THE FILM IS ON THE SCREEN. Two reels—book quick, feature big—marvelous posters!

"Phenomenal Growth of the Universal"

Some of the causes found in the feature list for week of December 14th

MONDAY, December 14: "THE MILL STREAM," wonderful two reel human interest rural drama, by the Imp players, headed by King Baggot.

TUESDAY, December 15: "THE GHOST OF SMILING JIM," startling and gripping two reel story of a stolen mine, by the Gold Seal players, headed by Francis Ford and Grace Cunard.

WEDNESDAY, December 16: "A GAME OF WITS," unusual drama of intrigue in two reels, by the Eclair players, headed by Carol Holloway.

THURSDAY, December 17: "AMBITION," two reel story of the lure of the footlights and its consequences, by the Rex players headed by Ben Wilson.

FRIDAY, December 18: "HEART OF THE HILLS," new type of rustic story full of punch, presented in three reels, by the Victor players, headed by Mary Fuller.

SATURDAY, December 19: "THE CHRISTMAS SPIRIT," surpassing two reel tale of a derelict's very, very Merry Christmas, by the Bison players, headed by Murdock MacQuarrie.

SUNDAY, December 20: "A PAGE FROM LIFE," superbly acted drama from real life, with new situations and twists, in two reels, by the Rex players, headed by Herbert Rawlinson and Anna Little.

Single Reels—
Comedies that ARE comedies—
Dramas with the big "Punch"—
Going out every week in the United Service.

The starting of the United Service on November 8th was a distinct achievement. During the past six months, programs galore have been projected over night, a great fuss made about them for a week or two, and then they have passed into oblivion. On the other hand, from the time the first plans were made by this firm in 1913 for the United Service, the work of carrying them to completion progressed without a pause. Today the United, an accomplished fact, holds a strategic position as the best balanced, cleanest, most progressive service ever produced.

Good single reels are scarce. You can get them regularly in the United releases. You will find every picture a striking example of splendid story, fine acting and perfect photography. Each one is accompanied by strong, compelling paper.

These great single-reel releases PLUS powerful features PLUS superb specials constitute the United Film Service—the diversified, comprehensive, always-expanding service for live-wire exhibitors.

RUNAWAY JUNE

BY

GEORGE RANDOLPH CHESTER

AND

LILLIAN CHESTER

¶ Will be published in 2500 leading newspapers throughout the United States and Canada. ❁ ❁ ❁

¶ RUNAWAY JUNE will start where all other pictures end. It leads off with a wedding. The greatest and most expensive wedding ever shown on the screen. ❁ ❁ ❁ ❁ ❁ ❁

¶ RUNAWAY JUNE has action, suspense, dramatic punch, photography, direction, and last but not least the greatest story ever told on the screen.

¶ RUNAWAY JUNE was written for the screen. It is the first serial series ever written solely and entirely with this end in view. It is not a story just written and adapted to the screen, but it was written on order for us. ❁ ❁

¶ RUNAWAY JUNE deals with money, gold, love, romance, jealousy, hatred, mystery, a woman, a man—it deals with the drama of life. Yet through it all is a fine vein of comedy.

¶ RUNAWAY JUNE is a lesson. It is the problem of life. The rich, the poor, the working man and the millionaire are all interested in the problem that it offers. ❁ ❁ ❁ ❁ ❁

¶ RUNAWAY JUNE is not a "stunt" picture—not a chase picture—not a lot of situations thrown together in a haphazard way. ❁ ❁ ❁ ❁ ❁

¶ RUNAWAY JUNE means something more than just picture. George Randolph Chester has put his heart and soul into it. It is his greatest work. It is so good that he is willing to have his wife's name, Lillian Chester, associated with him in it. ❁ ❁ ❁ ❁

¶ RUNAWAY JUNE will be without a doubt the greatest serial ever released. There will never be one better.

¶ RUNAWAY JUNE will get the money for you no matter what program you are using. You will play to capacity when you show it. It runs for fifteen weeks, two reels a week. We want every exhibitor in the country to write to us for our advertising booklet —the greatest help to exhibitors ever put out. A fifteen weeks' campaign all laid out for you by the greatest advertising force in the country. ❁ ❁

¶ RUNAWAY JUNE is being produced by the Reliance Motion Picture Company, 29 Union Square, New York City, and can be had at any Mutual Exchange. ❁ ❁ ❁ ❁ ❁

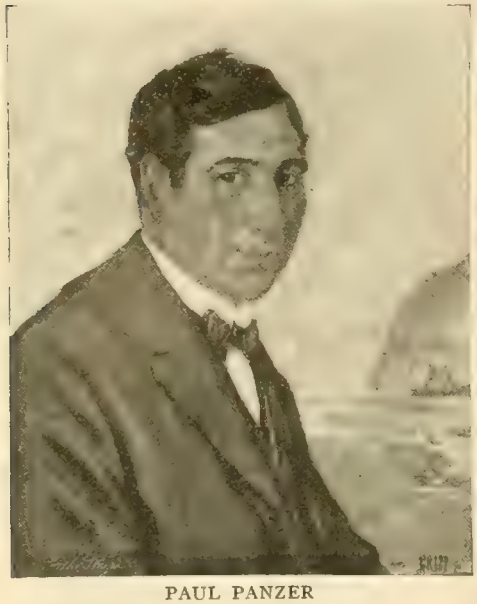
A New Idea in the Reproduction of Color Paintings has been adopted by PATHÉ

ELEANOR WOODRUFF



PAUL PANZER

In the portraiture of their leading players Pearl White, Eleanor Woodruff, Crane Wilbur and Paul Panzer—the cast of the "The Perils of Pauline"

These magnificent reproductions on canvas from the originals by the celebrated artists Goldbeck, Crisp, and Nikolaki, are made from a new and secret process—a process which places the perfect replica of an oil painting in full color within the reach of every exhibitor or motion picture fan at a price so low as to be seemingly impossible.

When framed they are unsurpassed for the lobby of a photo play house, or for the home. Each is a masterpiece in itself which cannot be distinguished from the original. We believe this is the first time in history that this claim has ever been justly made.

Each picture is autographed both by player and artist and was personally selected and approved by the player portrayed. They measure 13 x 17 inches and are mounted ready for framing.

Displayed in your lobby, they will lend your theatre distinction, and will create a demand among your patrons for copies of the pictures, which will open a new source of profit to you. We will furnish advertising matter.

The pictures or information concerning them may be obtained at any of the Eclectic Feature Film Exchanges, at the home office in New York, or through an exhibitor showing "The Perils of Pauline."

Price—$2.50 each, f. o. b. the Exchange where purchased.

IT'S TREMENDOUS! CRITICS EVERYWHERE HAIL IT THE MASTER SPECTACLE—AND A SPECTACLE WITH A LOGICAL, CLEARLY TOLD AND DRAMATIC STORY!

Featuring ANTHONY NOVELLI and a Supporting Cast of 20,000 People

ACTING? NOVELLI HAS NO PEER IN CLASSIC ROLES! HIS "CAESAR" IS HIS GREATEST WORK. PHOTOGRAPHY? LET'S REPEAT THE CRITICS—"UP TO KLEINE STANDARD." SETTINGS AND ENSEMBLE? PUT THREE "QUO VADISES?" TOGETHER AND YOU APPROXIMATE ONE-HALF THE SIZE OF "CAESAR." YOU NEVER SAW ITS LIKE BEFORE!

We shall play "JULIUS CAESAR" in every city, town and hamlet in the United States.

"I wish that every man, woman and child in the United States could see your wonderful picture," said Mayor Carter H. Harrison of Chicago.

That's our ambition, too. "Caesar" is the greatest single advertisement a picture manufacturer ever had. No village is too small to play "Caesar," and the print which charmed patrons of the Boston Opera House will captivate the villagers of the smallest western cattle town.

ANTONY and CLEOPATRA

FAMOUS FOR ITS TENSE, DRAMATIC MOMENTS AND ITS LIVING, BREATHING, EARTHY STORY! THE WORK OF NOVELLI AS "ANTONY" AND TERRIBILLI AS "CLEOPATRA," LEAVES AN UNFORGETTABLE IMPRESSION. THERE IS NO PRETTIER LOVE STORY IN ANY LANGUAGE OR ONE BETTER KNOWN!

In point of spectacle it's eclipsed only by "JULIUS CAESAR." Those long lines of marching soldiers, the panoply and splendor of Cleopatra's court, the luxurious Rome of other days and the mighty battles by sea and land, make "ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA" a pageant, rare as it is beautiful.

GEORGE KLEINE

CARBONS!

On Tuesday, July 30th, Germany declared war on Russia. On the Saturday preceding that day The Kleine Optical Co. received from Dusseldorf, Germany, the largest single shipment of carbons ever consigned to a motion picture supply dealer. The outbreak of hostilities found this company with a greater stock on hand than at any other period in its twenty years of successful merchandising!

The carbon situation became instantly critical. Other dealers were caught with varying stocks. Some thought they saw an opportunity—yielded to the pawn-shop theory of doing business and shot the price of carbons skyward!

They doubled, trebled and quadrupled the cost of a theatre necessity and a staple of the commonest kind!

The fact that you had always traded with them failed to count. The fact that those self-same carbons were bought at normal prices didn't alter the war-time price to you. The Kaiser declared war on the Czar and you were the goat. If you didn't want the carbons you could leave them. But you had to have them and you paid the price!

The Kleine Optical Co. received its shipment three days prior to the declaration of war in the usual way and at the usual price. There wasn't any reason why we should ask you a penny more. And we didn't!

But we did refuse to sell more than a limited quantity to a single exhibitor. What each exhibitor bought he paid for at normal prices. Several would-be financiers wanted to buy our entire stock at a fancy price and form a "Carbon Corner," but we had the carbons and they the ambition so you were protected! "Foxy Quillers" took the hint and kept away!

So much for a sense of decency tinctured with good old-fashioned honor. The carbon situation has cleared the horizon of much sentimental flub-dub. Theres' not much sentiment in business, anyway, but in all successful business there's an ideal—honest merchandise at honest prices!

EDISON'S SUPERB HOLIDAY OFFERINGS

FLIGHT OF THE HOLY FAMILY
From the Edison Reel, "The Birth of Our Saviour"

SELDOM has there been grouped into one list such a varied, timely and talented lot of attractions as that offered in our December releases. Each is "gilt edged," and reveals special attention to details.
Here are only some of the list (since space would not permit of mentioning all):

MABEL TRUNNELLE is certainly doing most excellent work in the series, "Olive's Opportunities," in which she figures as "Olive" the gypsy girl. One of this series is released every Tuesday. Dec. 1st, 8th, 15th, 22nd, 29th.

ROBERT CONNESS needs no introduction, for his superb acting is the talk of many admirers. This time he figures as "Major Dalberg" in the "Colonel of the Red Hussars." In Three Reels. Released Dec. 16th.

WALTER E. PERKINS, who took the role of "Toppy," or Lieut. Newman, in the play by Du Souchett, "Who Goes There," takes the same role in this most excellent reel by the same title. Released Dec. 4th.

MARC MacDERMOTT plays a double role in "The Best Man"—as the jilted bridegroom and the real benedict. Much merriment is created by the many embarrassing situations. Released Dec. 11th. Marc MacDermott also figures in "A Premature Compromise" as "Lord Stranleigh," a dramatic representation of the famous Lord Stranleigh Series by Robt. Barr. Released Dec. 25th.

BIGELOW COOPER makes a fine smuggler and counterfeiter in "Mr. Daly's Wedding Day," bribing both cop and cabby. Released Dec. 28th.

WILLIAM WEST, as "Mr. Morris, Sr.," makes a good street corner Santa Claus, and eventually a real Santa Claus "On Christmas Eve" (title of reel) in the Morris home, where he is received with open arms as "grandpa," after his banishment by his pretentious daughter-in-law some time previous. Released Dec. 6th.

GERTRUDE McCOY plays the part of "The Stenographer" and brings into strong relief the economic necessities and pitfalls that beset the girl who earns her living. Released Dec. 12th. Gertrude McCoy also takes the part of "Mary" in "The Birth of Our Saviour." (See below.)

WILLIAM WADSWORTH makes an excellent "Flirt" in a comedy by the same name by Gilbert White, and creates some side-splitting situations as he turns from girl to girl till at last he is pursued by all his rejected ones. Released Dec. 14th.

BARRY O'MOORE as "Octavius" takes the part of Santa Claus and gets mixed up with a burglar, who plays Santa Claus, too, in the same home. "The Adventure of the Wrong Santa Claus" is the title of the reel. Released Dec. 21st.

THE BIRTH OF OUR SAVIOUR. A very reverent presentation of the events narrated in Scripture, together with such legends as would add to the pictorial effect without contradicting or in any way impairing the Scripture account. Superb illustrations. Carleton King takes the part of "Joseph," Gertrude McCoy that of "Mary." Released Dec. 19th.

"A DOUBLE ELOPEMENT" will delight both old and young. A widow and a widower fall in love, but hide from each other the fact that one has a son grown up, the other a daughter of marriageable age. The real surprise comes when son and daughter elope and overtake the eloping widow and widower at the station. A hilarious scene ensues. Released Dec. 2nd.

Facts and Comments

AN AMUSING manifestation of the jealousy of the "legitimate" toward motion pictures is found in the fact that here and elsewhere certain playhouses put out this sign: "Not A Moving Picture." Who would or could have thought it would ever come to this on Broadway? Evidently the motion picture has ceased to be a novelty or an exception on the world's greatest showlane. Perhaps the "legitimate" will, in due time, become the novelty and exception. There is, however, no real cause for alarm. Good productions on the speaking stage are better patronized than ever before. "Hard times" and "bad business" seem strange fictions when one stands beside the ticket office of a Broadway theatre, whether devoted to the silent or to the speaking stage. It is true that the motion picture has put the finishing touches on the cheap "musical comedy" and on cheap productions on the speaking stage generally. Productions of real merit have nothing to fear from the rivalry of the motion picture. Quality will continue to tell both on the stage and on the screen.

A SURVEY of educational films of the scenic variety reveals a strange and significant fact. It seems that pictures of foreign subjects are far more numerous than pictures of our own country. The beauty spots of Europe, Switzerland for instance, and Italy have been covered with thoroughness. The same holds true of France, Germany, Holland and the Scandinavian countries. The kinematographic records of the natural beauties of our own country, its historic sites, many of them noted for their picturesqueness, its unique and extended trade commerce and industry are, comparatively speaking, incomplete. It seems to us that such pictures might be taken at small cost and would be reasonably sure of a market. Any good high-school text book would make a first-class scenario.

TEACHERS in the public schools remark frequently upon the influence of the motion picture upon their pupils. They say that children who are regular patrons of the better class of houses often are away ahead of their textbooks in such subjects as geography and history. Such children ask questions which show unusual quickness of perception. If the purely incidental educational values of the picture have this splendid result what may we not expect of a systematic course in educational pictures? Proofs of the value surround us on every side. Take the Kleine production, "Julius Caesar." No textbook, no, not even "The Commentaries" themselves, can give a more vivid picture of the Gaellic wars than this masterpiece of historical films. The same holds true of all the other parts of "Julius Caesar," whether they relate to the life of the conqueror or the events in the history of Rome.

VARIOUS complaints have reached this office concerning the action of certain companies who are in the business of issuing coupons to be redeemed at a reduced rate after having been distributed to the public as premiums by tradesmen. One exhibitor claimed to have proof that the coupon company with which he had been induced to deal had broken its promises and failed to redeem its obligations. Without wishing to pass on individual controversies it may be pointed out as a general principle and a safe line of conduct for the exhibitor that no real profit can ever come to him through dealing with any of the coupon concerns. These concerns naturally are more interested in their profits than in the welfare of the exhibitor. Coupons invariably cheapen a theater. The best policy is not to listen to the agent of the coupon company at all.

IT is a pleasure to hear a prominent film man say that in promoting his own particular brand of film he does not intend to cast stones in advertisements at his competitors. The advertiser is expected to devote the space he pays for to a detailed recital of his perfections and the trade gives him a hearing. To catalogue the imperfections of all his rivals as a rule weakens rather than strengthens his advertisement. We have made repeated appeals in the name of common sense and good business to have advertisers confine themselves to a description of their own products rather than a denunciation of the other fellow's products and we hope we have accomplished something on behalf of sane advertising. The tendency to "brand, belay, flay and score" the wicked competitor has, however, not wholly died out by any means. Recently we saw an "ad" in which the author enthusiastically pictures himself as a Santa Claus rather than a film man out for sordid profit, but cannot refrain from comparing himself favorably to competitors who lack his philanthropic instincts.

Great Subjects

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

NOTHINGNESS may be attained by following the rules and regulations of scenario editors and those writers who grasp at the substance and never lay hold of the soul of a story. Dictating to an author how he shall write is not unlike telling a plant how it shall flower, and no one has yet succeeded in wishing an orchid on a dog-fennel. There are undoubtedly many who possess the power of telling an interesting story, to whom proper circumstances have never presented themselves for development. There are minds capable of grand creative achievement that have never produced anything from lack of opportunity—no single ray of light has come from the fires of genius slumbering within—but those minds cannot grow like a mole in the ground. They need years of hard training to prepare them for supreme effort, and only a mind so prepared can deal with great subjects so as to make them of supreme interest and advantage to mankind.

There are well trained minds, however, now burrowing around for plots, or browsing on dried up literature, which might well be occupied in making ready for visualization dramas of human life to stir the hearts and set minds aflame of all who see them. There are practical reasons for conservatism of subjects, yet, on the other hand, there exists a demand, amounting to a logical necessity, for the presentation of subjects which, like all human efforts, are directed to the modification of existing conditions of things. We are no longer in a stage of primordial groping. We are aiming to control, not only simple phenomena, whose governing laws we know, but we are also aiming to understand and control a great deal that seems mysterious through our own limitations. Not only are we grappling with material developments through exact science, but we are attempting to penetrate the very spirit that actuates our investigation. Why should we build and struggle for generations to come—those we may never see or know—unless there is in us something nobler and finer than the instincts of self-preservation and reproduction? We take care of ourselves because of an egotism that knows no limit as long as it is fed and housed. We keep the earth populated and watch over its budding flowers with care born of natural affection, but we go further than that in trying to give those who follow us advantages we do not now enjoy. There is something of that sentiment in many of those facing death or disability in the battle trenches of Europe. Hundreds of thousands are giving up all they hold dear for a principle.

There is bound to be manifested in moving pictures some of that spirit which has made for progress along one direct and continuous line, in spite of alternating advances and halts, since the earliest times of which we have any knowledge. I am only one of many who would like to express through moving pictures what might help convert latent progress into active progress. We cannot break down all unfavorable conditions opposed to us, but we can besiege the enemy and keep firing away, as I have been doing for many years, to win a battle for the interesting presentation of what may contribute to human happiness. The ultimate end of social effort, what is it? Why are we all contributing in a way to that social effort? It is because we are imbued with a spirit that rises above selfish considerations, a spirit that regards increased human happiness as the best end for which we can strive.

Long lists, though not complete ones, of great subjects, have been given in previous articles—what I am urging here is that we begin to consider their tremendous value, instead of eternally reiterating that John loved Mary and, in spite of Joe, kissed her at the end, or that Joe shot Jim and laid it on John, that Mary might find it out and clear John. Not that I have any objection to repeating the same incidents and situations over and over again, but let those incidents and situations be subordinate to a meaning. Use all kinds of actions, impulsive or deliberate, moral or ethically indifferent, but use them to an end. Have the characters just or unjust, beneficent or maleficent, progressive or conservative, individual or social, remembering, however, that action is not the moving power, but motive.

It may be shown that vanity results in great good where it inspires an effort to win favorable opinion, that love of money is not always the root of evil, especially where it spurs industrial activity. It is a great subject when it broadens conception, especially among those who fail to see good and become hostile to what operates for good. Plays that tend to do away with "envy, malice and all uncharitableness" to which frail human nature is prone, are better than sermons. People can see the point for themselves without having it thrust at them. Those of us who worry a great deal about the morals of the rest of us and go about with an "I-am-better-than-thou" cast of countenance, furnish great subjects for comedy. Most of us are aware of the hypocrisy of such presumption and enjoy seeing it played on the screen. It is when we deal with moral deliberative actions that are sincere that we reach great subjects.

For instance, there is generally supposed to be a faculty in man by which he is rendered capable of judging of his own actions, whether they are right or wrong, but ethics vary with latitude and longitude, even with the climate, so the delicate question may be handled in photostory as to whether a man is guilty of wrong if unaware that he is doing wrong. There is a powerful appeal in such subjects to natural justice, as has been illustrated in some of the most popular feature productions of the day. One cause of narrow-mindedness is that a man often considers himself exempt from what he applies to others. The villain Shakespeare most despised was not the cutpurse, but "he who steals my reputation," the man whose mean envy causes him to stigmatize his fellows behind their backs, though he may parade honesty in all his other social relations. Where does conscience come in when a man does harm under a mask of doing good?

Is not experience the only true source of moral ideas? Ideas generally result from experience, and it would seem that visualizations of human experience might solve some of the knotty problems of experience. The field of moving pictures seems to be the domain of human action. Then great subjects might easily be the subjects we are constantly discussing among ourselves. Ethical questions are sometimes settled and views determined by a presentation of the facts, especially when they are not answered by arbitrary rules or abstract principles. I advocate great subjects instead of pretty ones for their liberalizing influence. We are constantly broadening on questions of moral responsibility and beginning to grasp the fact that we are subject to illusions, which great plays may help to clarify if not set right. They may even lead us to depend less on law and more on conditions that make for right conduct.

The Artistic Conscience

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE source and origin of all artistic success is a tender artistic conscience. It is an unfailing antidote against all that is false, artificial and labored. Perhaps the tenderest, artistic conscience of all the men in this country belongs to David Belasco. When not long ago I interviewed him on the growth and future of motion pictures he said that he had been repelled by the obvious unrealities of "life as it is lived on the screen." For years thereafter the motion picture was to him a mortal sin against Art, a detestable "fake," in the same category as the puppet show and far less respectable.

It was a mere accident which changed Belasco's opinion; while sojourning in Paris he went once more to a motion picture entertainment, thinking that the screen in Europe might show to better advantage. That, of course, was a mistake, for there has never been more than a hairbreadth's difference between the artistic value of the screen on the two sides of the water. The fact that Belasco was pleasantly disappointed and now saw something in which at least the roots of an art were plainly discernible was due not to the difference between New York and Paris, but to the difference in time.

The lapse of five years had done much for the screen. The unrealities were still there and cling to it even at this moment, but there was hope in the quality of 1912 and the promise of the future. I do not mean to say for one moment that there was no art in motion pictures before 1912. On the contrary, there was a distinct vein of art in most of the old Biograph productions released in the three or four years before 1912. Likewise, there was a school of art which successfully portrayed the lives of the plain people of our own country. Old exhibitors will know what I mean. I speak of the excellent Selig productions of 1908 and 1909. Nor were the productions of other firms without traces of quality. The deterioration and the lack of art and the ridiculous unrealities of the screen began with the sudden increase of quantity and with the development of a rivalry which aimed in all factions far more at quantity than at quality.

The blight of stupid commercialism, which has done so much to injure the American stage in spite of its wonderful native vigor and vitality, fell upon the motion picture. There came into being a crop of men believed to be directors by those who held the purse-strings of the cheaper and newer producing companies. These men whose chief asset was an inexhaustible supply of "nerve" were utterly without an artistic conscience. They have decreased in number, but they are by no means extinct.

It must hurt every friend of the motion picture to see writers in the press refer to motion pictures as a synonym for unreality and exaggeration. The screen, the newest and the best mirror of Nature, is turned into a trick mirror. With the most glorious opportunities to portray mankind in all its big actions and in all its most trifling details the screen is often far more artificial than the stage. There is an unfortunate tendency to give an imitation rather than a portrayal of life. The imitation may be defined as life the way it appears to a director with narrow views and limited experience in life and minus even the traces of an artistic conscience. There are scores upon scores of actors and directors to whom acting and directing means to be unreal. They pose and attitudinize. They work not like inspired artists, but like a lot of day-laborers under the watchful eye of the foreman, each one trying hard to make it appear that he is earning his wages while "working before camera." Instead of being in their actions a reflection of life they manifest all the features of a caricature.

Every man, woman and child going more or less regularly to motion picture theaters are well aware of all this. The monotonous mass of time-table releases falls flat, show after show, and if the industry had to depend upon this sort of output it would possess but a very small share of public favor. Right now there is the best chance ever for single reels of the type of the best quality in 1908, 1909 and 1910. Condensation was the order of the day in those years. The unrealities, the ludicrous "reel-life" so plainly distinguishable from the real life, were to be found here and there in the pictures that came from certain sources, but there was generally enough quality for the building of a good program. Had the exhibitor in those days been free to choose, the producers specializing in unrealities and in travesties of life would, no doubt, have been crowded to the wall, but the lines of progress would have run differently, the growth of many inferior producing companies would have been impossible and the whole situation would have been dominated by quality without any revolutionary shocks.

It is believed in some quarters that an artistic conscience is a commercial impossibility. In such circles art is spoken of as an expensive form of insanity. Knowledge and appreciation of art is supposed to be confirmed to a few cranks, who know nothing about the tastes and the demands of the masses. The fact, however, seems to be that art and quality, really interchangeable terms, are emphatically successful in a commercial sense. The company conceded to be the first in the production of film dramas and in the general test of quality is concededly the most prosperous. This company has from the very beginning avoided the unreal and the cheap and has cultivated the artistic conscience more than any other. Hence its tremendous hold upon the public patronage not alone in this country but in all the big cities of Europe.

In too many cases the walls of the motion picture studio are of the Chinese variety, shutting in an artificial world out of focus and out of sympathy with the real world, of which the studio ought to be a part and a true reflection. When the product of such a studio with the Chinese environment is thrown upon the screen and submitted to the judgment of the public its falseness is detected immediately and causes a curious mixture of grief and humor. Some of those unreal "dramas" are laughed to scorn the moment they see the light of the screen. Likewise the comedies proceeding from this purely directorial atmosphere are received with every evidence of ill-repressed pain.

Of course, an artistic conscience cannot be cultivated where it does not exist, but it can be hired often at ludicrously low prices. A fair quantity of it always kept on hand will penetrate the Chinese wall of unreality, which has done so much to give comfort to the enemies of the screen.

The atmosphere of realism and of art in realism cannot exist within Chinese walls hermetically sealed on all sides. Nor can the products of this artificiality be exposed on the screen without much ridiculous shrinking.

Picture Theater War Tax Questioned

Washington Attorney States Congress Did Not Intend to Include Them in Measure as Applied to Legitimate Houses.

By Clarence L. Linz.

ASIDE from being somewhat confused as to how to make payment of the tax prescribed in the recent act of Congress to increase the internal revenue, which was passed on October 22, motion picture exhibitors everywhere are declaring that the rates therein provided are exorbitant.

Under date of November 3, G. E. Fletcher, Acting Commissioner of Internal Revenue, at Washington, D. C., in a letter addressed to the Collector, Eleventh District, Columbus, Ohio, stated: "Replying to your communication of the 26th ultimo, you are informed that after careful consideration this office has reached the conclusion that motion picture theaters come under the sixth paragraph of section 3 of the act of October 22, 1914, and therefore are taxable as theaters."

Apparently there was some doubt in the mind of the collector in question and there is still more doubt in the minds of the exhibitors as to whether or not they are rightfully included in the paragraph and section referred to, which provides varying taxes from $25 to $100, acording to seating capacity.

A letter has been addressed to the motion picture exhibitors, exchangemen and others in Washington interested in the matter by L. B. Perkins, of the firm of Perkins & Perkins, Attorneys-at-Law, Riggs Building, Washington, D. C., wherein he states: "It is noted that the United States Internal Revenue Bureau intends taxing moving picture houses at the same rate as operatic and dramatic theaters under section 3, paragraph 6, of the recent war revenue act.

"Inasmuch as some moving picture owners in other cities contend that they are only taxable at a flat rate of $10, as provided by paragraph 8, of said section, and in view of my familiarity with the departmental procedure, I should be glad to discuss the matter with you should you be interested in order that you may save your rights when you pay the tax."

In an interview with the Washington correspondent of the Moving Picture World, Mr. Perkins stated that in his opinion, if Congress intended that moving picture shows were to be taxed at the same rates as the legitimate theaters, it would not have been beneath its dignity to use the expression "moving picture theaters."

"The moving picture theaters," said Mr. Perkins, "are well known places of amusement and Congress has not designated them as in the class of the legitimate theaters. The idea of the Internal Revenue Bureau is to bring them in by general construction of the words used, but I do not see why. Congress could easily have mentioned moving picture theaters in the drafting of the measure if they really were intended to be included at the same rate.

"Paragraph 8 provides for a tax on other places of amusement than those designated in paragraph 6, and that, so it seems to me, is intended to reach moving picture shows.

Exhibitors Should Pay Tax, but Protest.

"Of course," continued Mr. Perkins, "the exhibitors should pay the tax, but under protest, and if the case is ever taken into court, I do not know whether it will or not, and a decision is rendered in favor of the exhibitors, a refund would be made them. If the tax is paid without such protest, those exhibitors doing so will lose their rights under the law. Following the making of protest, no immediate action need be taken, for the case will hold good at any time within the ensuing two years.

"Under a decision of the Supreme Court, no particular form of protest is required; such action may be taken in a letter accompanying the remittance.

"There is still another step that may be taken. That would be a plea for the abatement of the claim before the tax is paid, but after the assessment is made. If such plea be rejected, the exhibitor should then pay the tax under protest and file claim for a refund. A rejection of the claim for refund would give the claimant the right to go into the courts with his case. I do not think this latter course would avail of much, for once the department makes a decision it is a foregone conclusion that it will carry it out, and it would in the end prove a waste of time and energy.

"The proper thing for the exhibitors to do would be, as I have stated before, to file a protest at the time of making payment. That will conserve their rights to them in the event a test case is brought."

Inasmuch as many of the exhibitors have already paid their tribute into Uncle Sam's coffers, the World correspondent asked Mr. Perkins as to what rights they would have in the matter, to which he replied that, in his opinion, a claim for refund would be the step to be taken to bring the matter to the attention of the department; a claim for the refund of such amount as they deem in the payment by them to be exorbitant or illegal. A letter should accompany the claim stating that payment was made under a misapprehension and misconstruction of the law as to the proper classification of motion picture theaters.

This matter has been flashed on the exhibitors of Washington so suddenly that little opportunity has been given for thought; in fact, until told by the World correspondent and attention brought to the warning contained in the issue of November 28, the exhibitors were unaware of the penalty attached to delinquency in making returns.

ARRESTED FOR SUNDAY SHOWING.

A mix-up recently occurred in Jeffersonville, Ind., which resulted in the postponement of the trial of several moving picture men up for alleged violation of the Sunday closing law. The defendants were all of the impression that the trial would be held at the City Court room in police headquarters, and assembled there instead of at another and larger hall. The action is against Ernest Deal, Roscoe Heimbaugh, Louis Oetterer and Rader Thornley, employees of the Dream Theater, and V. K. Williams, manager of the Jefferson.

Alco Has Receiver for a Day

Messrs. Sievers and Lichtman Retire from Film Company—With New Capital Officers Plan Expansion.

UPON the application of William Sievers of St. Louis, treasurer of the Alco Film Corporation, Judge Learned Hand of the United States District Court on Friday, Nov. 20, appointed as receiver of the film company an attorney named Arthur E. Gotthold. Announcement of the court proceedings aroused considerable interest in the trade. Before Saturday was over a statement was made on behalf of the company that differences had been composed and that the stock owned by Al Lichtman and Mr. Sievers had been purchased by President Walter Hoff Seely and his associates. At the opening of court on Monday morning the receivership was discontinued.

Walter Hoff Seely.

The Alco Film Corporation was organized last August with an authorized capital of $1,500,000. Mr. Sievers, in the bill in equity which he filed, recited that the corporation was without funds to continue business unassisted. When the present organization was formed to continue the business formerly operated by the Alco Film Company, Inc., and the Atsco Company, the plaintiff averred it was the understanding that the latter would turn over to the new corporation assets aggregating $132,000, but he said subsequent developments showed the assets of the film company were less than $40,000 and that the unexpected shortage precipitated the embarrassment.

"The infusion of new blood and new capital into the Alco Film Corporation has been a matter for general congratulation throughout the film industry," said the company in a statement issued on Monday. "The prompt discontinuance of the receivership suit and the equally prompt purchase by President Walter Hoff Seely and his associates of the stock held by William Sievers, Al Lichtman and their associates speedily put an end to any misunderstanding which may have existed in any quarter as to the stability of Alco. The Alco exchanges throughout the country have telegraphed to President Seely expressions of their entire confidence in him, his associates and in Alco. They are going ahead vigorously distributing the Alco releases throughout their territory, as well as the radium gold fibre screen and other theater supplies which are handled by the Atsco department of the releasing corporation.

"The list of releases which has already been announced will be followed by the reorganized corporation. Florence Nash, Mabel Taliaferro, Madame Olga Petrova, Jane Cowl and Beatriz Michelena will appear, as has been stated, in photoplays based upon the legitimate successes already announced. Many other well-known stars in other unusual successes of the theater are controlled by the releasing corporation and its producing allies. Work upon these new releases is already begun and details will be announced at the proper time.

"The Alco group of producers, which is composed of the All-Star Feature Corporation, the California Motion Picture Corporation, Popular Plays and Players, Inc., B. A. Rolfe Photo Plays, Inc., and the Life Photo Film Corporation, has expressed its entire confidence in the reorganized releasing corporation. The various heads of these producing organizations state that they see the brightest future for themselves and the parent company. The elimination of all friction within the company they regard as one of their largest assets.

"Robert T. Kane continues as supervisor of exchanges. He will visit, as heretofore, the branches throughout the country and bring them into better relations with one another and the parent company. He acts as a medium through which ideas are passed both between various exchanges and between exchanges and the home company.

"Harry Cohen becomes the new manager in place of Al Lichtman. While Mr. Cohen remains with Popular Plays and Players, Inc., many of his duties there will be taken over by one of his assistants, who is promoted for the purpose."

John D. Dunlop, prominent financier and banker, well known in the downtown financial sections of New York, has entered the directorate of the Alco Film Corporation. Mr. Dunlop, when seen at the office of the Alco Film Corporation, expressed himself as highly gratified at the condition of the Alco Corporation, and said he was entering the film field only after having subjected the company to the most rigid scrutiny.

Colonial Prober's Answer

Say No Harm Has Been Done to Law's Reputation—Assert Allegations Mentioned in Circular True and Accurate.

THE Colonial Owners' Protective Committee which was organized to investigate the formation of the Colonial Motion Picture Corporation and probe charges of fraud in the promotion of the sale of stock denies that its members have maliciously attacked and destroyed the reputation of James D. Law, former president of the corporation.

In an answer filed in the United States District Court to Law's action to recover damages on the ground that his reputation has been injured, the members of the committee reiterate that the allegations set forth in circulars mailed to the stockholders of the film corporation prior to the last annual election of officers and directors were true and accurate.

It is alleged Law conspired with divers persons to perpetrate a fraud upon prospective stockholders in the formation of the corporation by selling worthless patents and property at excessive sums. The committee charges that Law caused the incorporation of the film company, employing dummy directors and subsequently entered into contracts with the corporation under which he was to receive $100,000 for real estate at Wissahicken, Pa., which is said to be worth only $14,000, and to receive commissions of 20 per cent. on sale of stock.

Under the terms of the contract for the sale of stock it is alleged Law was not to receive any commissions until $250,000 had been paid into the treasury from the sale of stock, but although only $265,675 was actually subscribed for and only $158,337 had been paid in, the committee alleges Law drew out about $20,000 in salary and commissions.

The members of the committee are John D. Dunlop, Alwyn Ball, Jr., Roland Phillips, Howard C. Griffiths and James C. Clarkson.

Pictures for Panama Exposition

Edison Company Makes Many Thousand Feet of Special Subjects to Be Shown at the Big Fair.

SPECIAL representative Alex. T. Moore, of the Thomas A. Edison, Inc., brings in the news that the Edison motion picture producing department has just completed many thousand feet of special pictures which will be shown at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition at San Francisco next year. Probably the most important of the series is 20,000 feet depicting historical events, views of Boston Harbor and other scenic points of interest in the State of Massachusetts, together with various state and commercial activities in that commonwealth. These views will be shown in the Masachusetts State Building.

Another series will be similar views taken in the state of New York, amounting to 15,000 feet, which will be shown in the New York State building at the Exposition.

In addition to these state enterprises will be pictures taken at the factories of William Skinner & Sons, at Holyoke, Mass., illustrating the various processes of making the famous "Skinner's Silks and Satins;" also, of the processes of making silk thread as employed at the mills of the Corticelli Silk Company at Florence, Mass.

The Edison forces are working at present on a comprehensive picture for the Wells-Fargo Express Company, showing the handling of a fragile package from New York to San Francisco. This is an interesting picture story which connects the various scenes in the different departments of the big express company worked out in dramatic form.

These pictures will be projected by the new Edison Super-Kinetoscope, of which there will be two in each building.

Backs Up National Board

Decision of Justice Davis in the Matter of "The Ordeal" Strengthens Broad Censorship Plan.

THE decision handed down by Judge Vernon M. Davis in the Supreme Court of the State of New York in the case of the Life Photo Film Corporation vs. George H. Bell, Commissioner of City Licenses, establishes an important point in connection with the censorship of motion pictures. It very materially strengthens the plan of the National Board of Censorship to extend its activities to all large cities through local committees in each city appointed by the Mayor, deriving their legal powers from the licensing power of the cities over the theaters.

In the case before Judge Davis, "The Ordeal," a picture made by the complainant corporation, showing alleged German atrocities which had previously been condemned by the National Board of Censorship, was ordered off the screen of the Lexington Avenue Theater by License Commissioner Bell after a complaint against it had been investigated by his office. The Commissioner's action in ordering the play off the screen was based on the grounds that it had previously been condemned by the National Board of Censorship as being a violation of the principle of neutrality and to show it would be against public policy, in which finding the representative of his office concurred after viewing the picture on the screen of the theater.

The producing corporation thereupon sued out an injunction against the License Commissioner, which Judge Davis by his decision today, vacated. This establishes the claim that the police powers of the city extend, not alone to pictures or plays that are obscene or immoral in their character, but include also pictures or photoplays which are believed to be against public policy. Executive Secretary McGuire of the National Board of Censorship at the request of Assistant Corporation Counsel Nicholson, submitted affidavits from seven members of the Board who had condemned the picture, as well as telegrams from Boston, Providence, Milwaukee, Kansas City, and Dallas, Texas, cities in which the picture was prohibited from being shown. A file of telegraphic correspondence between the National Board and Third Assistant Secretary of State Robert Lansing, was also introduced, denying that the Department of State had, as was alleged in the theater advertisement of the play, approved of the picture either directly or indirectly or that it was being shown by special dispensation of the Department.

Exhibitors Likely to Amalgamate

Picture Men of Eastern and Western Pennsylvania Planning to Get Together—Convention Called for Jan. 4-6, 1915.

PENNSYLVANIA exhibitors are awake, and should the present plans materialize the Keystone state will have one of the strongest organizations in the country. On Wednesday, November 18, through the efforts of the Reading members of the executive committee of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania, a meeting of the state officers was called, for Harrisburg. Six of the members responded, President Wheeler being the only absentee. Those present included Ben H. Zerr, J. G. Hansen, Frank A. Gould, all of Reading; Gilbert C. Miller, Plymouth; Francis E. Devlin, Wilkes-Barre; E. F. McAtee, Mahanoy City.

An invitation sent to the members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, which is comprised of picture men in the vicinity of Pittsburgh, to send a representative to Harrisburg to confer with the eastern exhibitors, was accepted, and Fred J. Herrington was on hand. Although the western organization had planned a convention at Harrisburg early in January, the eastern exhibitors were anxious to join them and now it is more than likely that the bodies will amalgamate into one organization. This will necessitate the officers of both associations to resign and a new body of officials elected. The convention is called for January 4 to 6, 1915.

Mr. Herrington assured the League officers that Pittsburgh would be well represented at the convention, while the western representative felt encouraged as to the showing the eastern exhibitors would make.

Unfortunately the eastern and western exhibitors have been divided, but the friction appears to have been forgotten and a mammoth state organization is hoped for by the League and Association officers.

Messrs. Zerr and Hansen have been authorized to cover the entire eastern end of the state, urging exhibitors to attend the state convention. One of the principal matters to be taken up at Harrisburg will be to have the censor law repealed. Other points of equal significance to exhibitors will be discussed. Concluding the conference the following Harrisburg exhibitors were authorized to make the necessary arrangements for holding the convention and exhibit I. Silverman, Clyde D. Klinger, Anthony George, C. Floyd Hopkins, John M. Lenney, I. Marcus and P. Magare. A general committee appointed by Chairman Zerr includes the following: Frank D. Hill, J. G. Hansen, Harry J. Schad, I. A. Deisher and Frank A. Gould, all of Reading; Dr. Walter Stuempfig, E. A. Jefferies, George Roth, M. J. Walsh, Jay Emanuel, F. Benn and S. Segal, all of Philadelphia; Fred W. Hermann, Francis E. Devlin, Gilbert C. Miller, Edward J. Brislin, all of Wilkes-Barre; M. E. Comerford, Geo. S. Thomas, Scranton; Miss Mae Carr, Hazleton; E. F. McAtee, Mahoney City; Frank P. Gilligan, Ashley; Wm. W. Fagely, Bloomsburg; Harry Friedman, Duryea; Jos. P. Aikens, State College; A. Geo. Strojny, Nanticoke; W. A. Pittis, Beaver Falls; Lewis Marinos, Luzerne; A. H. Dartt, Wellsboro; R. J. McGowan, Larksville.

Additional names will be added.

The Church and Social Service Bureau

Its Activities Transferred to 80 Fifth Avenue.

THE Reverend William Carter, the President of the Church and Social Service Bureau, has established new and extensive offices on the twelfth floor of the Hudson Building, 80 Fifth avenue, and with a staff of able assistants he is renewing his appeal to all churches who stand in need of special motion picture service.

Mr. Carter has enlisted the unqualified support of prominent clergymen of all the Protestant denominations. On the advisory board are such men as William J. Shieffelin, Rev. David J. Borrell, Rev. William H. Roberts, Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, Rev. J. B. Remensnyder and more than a score of other prominent churchmen. Rev. Josiah Strong is at the head of the sociological department, while Rev. John Grier Hibben, president of Princeton, and William H. Maxwell have consented to become educational advisers. The Board of Directors consists of Charles G. Bond, of the law firm Coulter & Bond; H. W. Davis, of Wilmington, Del.; George T. Brokaw, of Gulick, Brokaw & Springs; George T. Coxhead, of International Y. M. C. A. Com.; Hamilton Holt, editor, "Independent"; Gen. E. A. McAlpin; William Fellowes Morgan, treasurer, Merchants' Association, N. Y., and the Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst. Dr. Carter and Dr. Strong are also members of the board.

The offices of the bureau consist of six rooms, a splendid projection room with two machines enclosed in fireproof booths and a special film and repair room. Dr. Carter says that the bureau is meeting with gratifying response from churches everywhere and that contracts for regular service are being signed constantly. The bureau will for the present and for the immediate future devote itself exclusively to renting films, but may enter the producing field along purely religious and educational lines later on. Dr. Carter said that the bureau had closed a contract with the Edison Company whereby this company, which has produced so many splendid sociological and educational films, will allow the bureau the special handling of all its films of this character.

At a recent private exhibition a most interesting picture made by the Universal Company was shown in the projection room of the bureau. The picture showed the dangers to children playing around bonfires and also shows how by a cheap and simple process children's clothing can be protected against fire.

SALOON LEAGUE SHOWS "JOHN BARLEYCORN."

The Popular Theater at Honolulu, Hawaii, was leased by the Anti-Saloon League for an exhibition of "John Barleycorn." A free matinee for children was given.

USES PICTURES IN CANDIDACY BOOM.

A presidential candidacy boom—although not announced as such—is being conducted in Illinois and the preliminaries are being filmed for future use. Wherever ratification meetings of the election of United States Senator L. Y. Sherman are held a cameraman is on the job. Friends of Sherman are planning to urge him for the Republican nomination for the presidency.

WANTS LESS OBJECTIONABLE POSTERS.

Exhibitors in Milwaukee, Wis., have been warned that pasting a piece of paper over guns, knives and other weapons on posters is not enough to comply with the anti-crime advertising ordinance. President B. K. Fischer of the local Exhibitors' Association has notified the city officials that an attempt will be made to secure less objectionable posters from the manufacturers with all releases

Promoting Public Health

New York's Health Commissioner Makes Practical Use of Motion Pictures in Educational Campaign.

By Florence Margolies.

MUCH has been said, and great stress laid on the immense value of motion pictures as an educational factor. It has been clearly shown that these pictures prove a wonderful medium for reaching men, women and children in all sorts and conditions of life and that the most beneficial knowledge is thus disseminated among them that otherwise they never would have gleaned.

But it yet remained to be shown how motion pictures can be utilized in prolonging life. Yes, actually to prolong life. And what is there in science, literature and art—or for that matter in the general higher civilization—that is of more moment than the matter of prolonging life? From time immemorial, that was the supreme thing to be achieved, and all researches and experiments—by the mystic alchemist of yore as the most enlightened and modern man of science today—all seek to stretch the span of life allotted to humans. Not only, however, as a mere existing or being, but life cleared of all ailments and physical imperfections.

In fact, men who have made it their life's work to check, hinder and ultimately entirely eradicate malady and disease, assure us that "the flesh need not at all be heir to ills." But a great deal of work has got to be done; the most tireless efforts have to be directed toward the proper and careful teaching of the people—the great secret of preserving health. For it is that, in the last analysis, that makes for the prolongation of life and the retention of youth. Good health engenders good spirits and cheerfulness, which in turn is an indispensable attribute for the achievement of success in all walks of life. Mens sana in corpore sano.

All of which is apropos of the really great work now being done through the very capable and efficient Department of Health of New York City under the Commissionership of the eminent Dr. Samuel S. Goldwater.

For the first time in the history of that all important institution, or for that matter, in that of any similar institution in the United States, it is recognized that Health Education is a special function, and to that end a Bureau of Public Health Education was created about a year ago and is now under the directorship of Dr. Charles F. Bolduan.

And to hear Dr. Bolduan discourse upon the part that pictures play in his vast and telling work is to be inspired with the belief that mankind is to be thankful forever and a day, for that gracious boon, kinematography, granted by the gods.

"Following a conference with Deputy Commissioner Emerson," said Dr. Bolduan, "the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of New York has generously volunteered the services of over eight hundred moving picture theaters for the educational work of the Bureau of Public Health Education. Hundreds of theaters in the city displayed slides calling attention to the 'clean-up' campaign inaugurated by Commissioner Goldwater. And that was later followed by announcements concerning typhoid fever, flies, care of the baby, etc.

"The clean-up announcements were prepared in the form of lantern slides in English, Italian and Yiddish texts. Some of the striking statements read: 'Dirt Breeds Flies; Flies Carry Disease; Disease Means Doctors' Bills. Avoid Disease and Doctors Bills by Cleaning Up.'

"And," continued Dr. Bolduan with infections, but decidedly hygienic, enthusiasm, "during the summer the Department of Health had its free moving picture exhibitions in the parks and on the recreation piers of the city. Arrangements were made for twenty such shows to be given; ten in Manhattan; two in the Bronx; six in Brooklyn and one each in Long Island City and Flushing. In the Manhattan and Bronx exhibitions the Department was assisted by the Tuberculosis Committee of the Charity Organization Society; in Brooklyn and Queens exhibitions, by the Tuberculosis Committee of the Brooklyn Bureau of Charities.

"Each exhibition consisted of four reels of films: 'The Story of a Consumptive,' 'The Production and Handling of Milk,' 'The City Beautiful' and 'The Little Cripple.'"

All of those plays were carefully staged and most realistically acted and the audience watched each performance with unbroken attention, enjoying every minute of it while the intended lesson was subtlely but surely and easily brought home to them.

"Please mention the fact," requested Dr. Bolduan, "that the Bureau of Public Health has recently received a fully equipped moving picture machine as the gift of a friend who wishes to remain anonymous. Donations of that kind," insinuated the wily Doctor, "are very highly appreciated, not only for their own sake, but for the evidence they display of the public's interest in the work of the Department of Health.

"This machine will be taken to Jacksonville, Florida, where the Annual Convention of the American Public Health Association will be held at the end of this month." It is expected that motion pictures will come in for a large share of attention from the learned and honorable gathering there.

Combining good business sense with a sincere desire to help along in this splendid work, many exhibitors have volunteered the use of their theaters on Saturdays from ten to twelve in the morning. They will provide the lights, men and all but the reels. Naturally, they feel that the people once attracted to the theater will continue to visit it and thus a clientele can be established. Doing good invariably brings the reward. In this case it will be found in the box office.

Mention must also be made and it is interesting to learn that in connection with the Panama Pacific Exhibition, arrangements have been made to give a moving picture show of New York City, consisting of from twelve to fourteen reels. This show will embrace all of the principal sights and activities of the city and will serve the onlookers as a real visit to this metropolis. By no means of the least importance will be that part of this tremendous affair that deals with the Health Work.

Some day this enterprising Bureau of Public Health Education may spring a real surprise—evolve comedies and humoresques, if you please, to be enacted on the screen. And most effectively at that. For everything under the sun has its funny side (that is really the saving grace of life), and even the serious and all important work of the Health Department is not devoid of some attending humor.

Recently, for instance, a communication was received in the Bureau of Public Health Education, from a very worthy and well-intentioned individual, requesting, nay demanding, that that institution introduce a bill in the legislature purporting to prohibit the crossing of legs in all public conveyances. Not from the aesthetic viewpoint, or, perchance, moral, but because it is instrumental in tripping and causing the complete collapse of unobserving people.

Of course, it is hard telling under what category of crime this would come if such a law were passed, and one shudders to think of the terrible punishment such a misdemeanor would be liable for.

Bostock Animals Arrive

Aggregation of Trained Beasts Bought by David Horsley Now On Way to the Coast.

THE S.S. Minnewaska as she made fast to her dock in New York last Wednesday proved to be a reproduction, with certain glaring modernisms, of the good ship "Ark," of which Captain Noah lost control in the cosmic ocean in some indefinite period before the Christian Era.

Each ship carried the most wonderful collection of wild animals in existence at their respective times of sailing, the principal difference being in the motive power of the vessels and in the fact that Noah's animals were non-performing stock, while the Bostock animals are all carefully trained.

The Bostock collection was purchased by David Horsley of the Centaur Film Company, together with all of its names and titles, from the widow of the late Animal King, the sale being arranged by Harry E. Tudor, who has represented Mr. Bostock for many years.

About seven hundred feet of film was made of the animals as they were landed from the ship at the Atlantic Transport pier and transferred to the six seventy-foot baggage cars which, floating on flat scows, awaited them on the opposite side of the pier.

Cleopatra, the Alexandrian elephant, refused to be coaxed down the gangway, although a special flooring had been built to accommodate her unusual avoirdupois. A rope was finally adjusted around her queenly neck, said rope then being passed through a block and tackle and stretched by a team of horses down on the pier. Cleopatra braced her head flat on the gangway between her front feet to resist the captive march. Just at that instant some one on the ship gently applied a goad. This sudden and most unexpected indignity caused her to execute a double somersault which landed her in a setting posture at the front of the plank. Cleopatra expressed her displeasure in a sound which sent the gaping crowd scattering in all directions, but Harry Tudor, whose ancestors were also in the King and Queen business a century or two ago, and who therefore understands the regal temperament, whispered words which caused her to rise graciously, if not gracefully, and follow him.

Mark Antony, her ponderous consort, hesitated at the head of the gangway only until he spied Old Cleo at the foot, and then, as history also records of his illustrious namesake, followed his warlike mistress without faltering. When they were together again, Antony and Cleopatra entwined their trunks and trumpeted joyously.

Altogether there are one hundred and sixteen trained animals in the Bostock collection, all of which with the exception of a puma born on the voyage, perform extraordinary tricks singly and in groups. One of the lions rejoices in the classic patronym, Apollo. He is considered the handsomest animal of his kind in captivity, and will figure as the hero in a series of pictures in which every part will be played by an animal. The polar bear has been cast for the villain of this series, and Yorick, the Comical Chimpanzee who has made more people laugh than any circus clown, is first comedian. Yorick is said to be the most intelligent wild animal of this species ever exhibited. Starting, mounting and riding a motorcycle and blowing a baritone horn are only a couple of his marvellous accomplishments.

The entire zoo, in charge of Harry Tudor and twelve trainers, was reshipped by rail to Los Angeles, where Horsley Park will soon be opened up for their accommodation in conjunction with the new Centaur Studios where Mr. Horsley expects to produce a line of single and multiple-reel animal features which will set a new mark in this most popular kind of motion picture.

NEW MOTION PICTURE HOUSE.

A new motion picture theater is to be opened about January 1 in the one-story building at 602-604 Hennepin avenue, Minneapolis, Minn., according to a city building permit issued recently. The theater building is owned by B. N. Schneider and Harry Green is lessee.

ZERR ADMITS CIVIL WAR VETERANS FREE.

A vote of thanks and appreciation was tendered to Ben. H. Zerr, owner of the Schuylkill avenue motion picture theater in Reading, Pa., at a well attended meeting of the Keim Post No. 76, G. A. R., for his generous action in deciding to admit all Civil War veterans, wearing a G. A. R. bronze button to his entertainments, free of charge. Mr. Zerr invites the veterans to call as often as convenient.

Film Blaze Confined to One Floor

Offices of the American and European Film Company Completely Gutted—Total Loss Inside of $25,000.

THE fire in the building 145 West 45th street on Thursday, November 19, an account of which appeared in last week's number of the Moving Picture World, completely burned out the rooms on the western side of the sixth floor of the building. Smoke filled the entire structure, with the result that the tenants made a hasty exit. The elevators continued running until all were out. On account of the density of the smoke, however, many preferred to use the fire escapes. One young woman, Freda Applebaum, employed in the office of Daly, music publisher, across the hall from the rooms of the American and European Film Company, where the blaze started, promptly fainted and had to be carried down the fire escape. She suffered some from shock. It took four days to get back into shape the offices of the General Electric Utilities Company, just above the scene of the blaze. The heat caused considerable damage in the halls adjoining the American and European office.

The origin of the fire is not clear. One report ascribed it to the breaking of a film running over a motor-operated cleaner, the end of the film striking the motor and a spark resulting. One film man, in pointing out the unlikelihood of such a source, placed a piece of film about a motor in motion and held it with his bare hands just to show it would not ignite.

Judging from the number of empty cans in the rooms where the fire took place the number of feet of film destroyed would seem to be at least 100,000. The manager of the American and European is W. Joy Delamater. One of his associates is said to be Will H. Stetson, who was not actively connected with the management. The company's loss, which is said to be uninsured, is estimated at from ten to fifteen thousand dollars. The damage to other offices and halls probably will be well inside $10,000.

The agent of the building said the owners were more than satisfied with the way the Egyptian plaster blocks stood up in the great heat without crumbling or cracking.

PATENTS COMPANY HEARING DECEMBER 1-3.

Judge Dickinson in the United States District Court of Philadelphia appointed December 1, 2, 3, as the time that he would hear the Government's suit against the so-called motion picture trust, composed of the Motion Picture Patents Company and a number of other concerns. This action followed the application of United States District Attorney Kane and R. O. Moon, representing the Government and the defendants, respectively.

EDISON ENJOINS MANUFACTUARER.

Thomas A. Edison has brought an action in the United States District Court against Abraham G. Levi, a moving picture manufacturer, to recover damages and enjoin the latter from making and selling, leasing or selling films of "The Great Train Robbery."

The "Wizard of Electricity" alleges that he is the sole and rightful owner of the rights to the photoplay and avers the defendant has been manufacturing and leasing the film to exhibitors without his consent. The plaintiff asks that all copies of the film found in the defendant's possession be impounded by the court and that he be compelled to render an accounting and pay damages.

FILM BOARD'S RULES MEETING WITH SUCCESS.

The new rules of the Film Exchange Board of Trade of San Francisco regarding payment of bills and charges for posters and other advertising matter have been well received by exhibitors and have been placed into effect without any friction. The film exchangemen are working more in harmony with exhibitors than ever before and the latter agree that the new regulations will be to their advantage in that it will eliminate much unfair competition, one of the most serious things with which they have had to contend. With everyone placed on the same basis in the matter of meeting obligations, and with posters rented at a fixed charge, they feel that their business has been placed on a more substantial footing than before.

WILL BUILD ANOTHER THEATER.

E. N. Brown, who runs a moving picture theater on the west side at Grand Rapids, Mich., will soon open another at 430-432 Bridge street, that city. He will erect a new building which will have a seating capacity of 600 persons.

Boston Exhibitors Busy on Ball

A Great Deal of Activity Is Manifested in Advance Work on Second Annual Ball.

EXTENSIVE preparations are being made for the second annual ball of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts, which will be held at the Boston Arena on the evening of December 2. Over a score of well-known film favorites have signified their intention of attending. A feature of the ball will be ten prize dancing competitions for ten cups.

An enthusiastic meeting of the association was held at the Georgian Hotel on November 17. Over fifty members attended. From the reports of the different committees, the success of the affair is assured. E. H. Horstmann presided at the meeting. The plans were outlined and approved. Among those in attendance were Hiram Abrams, Harry Asher, J. A. Eslow, J. J. Leonard, E. J. Farrell, Samuel Hasse, Alonzo Hacking, Max Carmusin, Herman Rifkin, Louis Machatt, F. B. Murphy, George A. Friedmann, of Revere.

It is expected that Mayor James M. Curley and Governor David I. Walsh will attend the ball. The latter will be asked to lead the grand march. The committee announces that the following players will positively appear: Francis X. Bushman, Pearl White, Clara Kimball Young, Paul Panzer, Vivian Martin, Andy Clark, Marguerite Snow, Gladys Hulette, Flo La Badie, Viola Dana, James Cruze, Arthur Housman, Harry Benham, William Wadsworth, Edith Storey, Gene Gauntier, Hughie Mack, Jack Clark, Sid. Olcott and Valentine Grant.

A number of well-known New York film men will leave the Grand Central depot on two special cars attached to the Knickerbocker Limited. A delegation will meet them at the Back Bay station and they will be taken to the headquarters in the Copley Plaza Hotel. Included in this number are Adolph Zukor, P. A. Powers, Louis Selznick, Jacob Wilk, S. M. Spedon, Jesse Lasky, Samuel Goldfish, L. M. McChesney, Miller Reece Hutchinson, Charles Bauman, Adam Kessler and twenty others.

The executive committee of the league has been kept very busy during the past two weeks in making all necessary preparations. S. Grant, the chairman, is attending to most of the detail work. He is assisted by the following members: R. W. Drown, G. M. Clark, E. H. Horstmann, H. F. Campbell, P. F. Lydon, F. J. Howard, F. B. Murphy, C. W. Fraser, J. A. Eslow, W. H. Bradley, E. J. Farrell, H. Asher, H. L. Kincaide, H. I. Wasserman, H. A. Silovolos and J. F. Patten.

The heads of the other committees follow, cup, F. J. Howard; talent, E. H. Horstmann; entertainment, J. A. Eslow; tickets, R. W. Drown; music, H. I. Wasserman; publicity, S. Grant; refreshments, G. M. Clark; badges, P. F. Lydon, and reception, J. Laurie.

PHILADELPHIA EXHIBITORS TO DANCE DEC. 8.

Horticultural Hall will be the scene of the third annual dance of the Exhibitors' League of Philadelphia on December 8. Delegations from many film manufacturers have promised to come. It was decided that the honors of leading the grand march should fall upon Rosemary Theby and Romaine Fielding. A special committee has charge of the ball. Jay Emanuel, of the Ridge Avenue Theater, is chairman, and Messrs. Walsh, Spiers, Pollon, Hopkins, Fisher and Cropper are others on the special committee.

SAWYER TO PRODUCE IN BERMUDA.

A. H. Sawyer, president of Sawyer, Inc., announces that his company will soon begin the production of motion pictures. Bermuda has been selected as the best location for studio work on account of climatic and other advantages. Mr. Sawyer seriously considers the permanent location of a company there. He dwells upon the delights of those favored isles and believes that the best photographic work possible can be secured there and that pictures from that region will have added charm because of the wealth of natural scenery available. Details of the plans of production under consideration by Sawyer, Inc., will be announced shortly.

S. L. Warner's New Venture

SAMUEL L. WARNER, one of the original Warner Brothers, of whom there are at least six, has rejoined the ranks of American film men after a long stay in London, where he represented Warner's Features and where he made a host of friends both for his firm and for himself. He has no connection with Warner's Features now, but has launched forth upon his own account having incorporated as the S. L. Warner Company. He has opened branches in Cleveland, Chicago and also in San Francisco.

Samuel L. Warner.

Mr. Warner has made his bow upon his re-entry into the American market with a five-reel feature "Alone in New York," a production of the sensational order. He is also booking a regular war series which he imports regularly from London, having secured the American rights for a special series of war films made by English and Continental companies.

He says that conditions in London were bad when he left there shortly after the outbreak of the war, and he thinks they are probably worse today. All the theaters must close at nine o'clock, but they are fairly well attended during the day whenever patriotic pictures are shown. The demand for patriotic features has been of positive help to the British manufacturers.

Mr. Warner intends to import films as far as conditions will permit at this time and he will also be in the market for negatives. "All Alone in New York" he intends to book directly to the exhibitor, as he thinks that the state right system has become obsolete. Mr. Warner's connection with motion pictures began in the early part of 1911 when he helped to present Dante's Inferno in Canada and in various parts of the United States. His efforts were attended with considerable success.

ECLECTIC PICTURE PLEASES ARMY MEN.

"The Perils of Pauline" is a favorite with the regular army men in Honolulu, Hawaii. This serial is being run at Fort Shafter; Post Exchange, Ft. Kamehameha; Twenty-fifth Infantry Amusement Hall, Schofield Barracks; Castner Hall, Schofield Barracks, and Cavalry and Artillery Amusement Hall, Schofield Barracks. The shows at each place are held on different nights. The seating capacity of the moving picture theater at Fort Shafter has been increased and two big features will be run each week.

KLEINE'S "ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA" BOOKS HEAVILY.

George Kleine's "Antony and Cleopatra" is booking heavily among theaters of all kinds and sizes, according to the list of advance bookings from the various Kleine branch offices the past week, indicating a sudden increase of interest in the big Roman classics. While "Antony and Cleopatra" is heading the list. "Quo Vadis?" and "Spartacus" are making a strong bid for second place. "Julius Caesar" is booking solid in all offices and threatens to break all previous Kleine records.

RIFKIN BOOSTING ALLIANCE IN BOSTON.

Herman Rifkin, who is the Eastern Feature Film Co., of Boston, was in New York early in the week. When asked what he thought the prospects of a return of good times were he laughed and answered, "I have sworn off talking about what is to be to. I am too busy attending to the present to bother about the future. In the New England territory where my firm handles the Alliance Program, exhibitors are making money and are willing to pay good prices for good pictures. I am trying to give them what they want."

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

Censorship Again to the Front in Detroit.

SINCE the recent election in Detroit, representatives of the Detroit Federation of Women's Clubs have been seeking power to inspect and censor all moving picture shows in that city. The movement is based on an amendment to the city charter, providing for the appointment of a recreation committee composed of ten members. These members are to include the superintendent of education, the police commissioner, a member of the board of public works, the commissioner of parks, the commissioner of highways and five others to be appointed by the mayor.

The amendment, which was construed as aiming at the providing of additional playgrounds for children, etc., attracted little attention, and was carried by only a small majority. After the election, however, it was discovered that there was a clause in the amendment which gave the recreation commission power to inspect all theaters and other places of amusement with the privilege to suggest and pass on any improvements that might be made for the betterment of conditions.

Heretofore the licenses of all places of amusement were in the hands of the mayor, but the amendment recently passed gives the recreation commission power to recommend whether a license shall be granted or revoked, and the Federation of Women's Clubs is conducting an active campaign to have at least two of its members on the commission. A conference was recently held between three delegates from the federation and Police Secretary Walters, at which it was agreed that the volunteer censors from the federation should visit all moving picture theaters and make a report to the police department of any improper films.

The co-operation of the police department in suppressing such films and acts was assured by Secretary Walters, who explained that the reason the department had no regular censor was due to the board of estimators. When the police budget was submitted to the council some time ago, provision was made for the employment of a censor at $1,200 a year, an assistant censor at $1,000 and a moving picture machine operator at $1,000, to view all pictures and make eliminations of objectionable features. This part of the budget was slashed.

Asked if it would be agreeable to the police department to have the volunteer censors, Walters responded that their services would be welcomed and that steps would be taken to invest any women with authority to make the inspections.

Members of the federation object to the claim of the films displayed in a few theaters at so-called "special performances" for children on Saturday afternoons. Cheap pictures, usually of crime and violence, make up the greater part of a program of this kind, they claim.

From what I could learn and see during my brief stay in Detroit, the moving picture business was in good condition and the shows clean. I did hear, however, that certain so-called feature film men were responsible for the introduction of some subjects that are not at all creditable to the trade. Why are such men not held tightly in check by the responsible men in the business? These small fellows, like small foxes, spoil the grapes.

Was the Late Miss McHugh Married?

Mrs. Alice Golby, mother of the late Miss Grace McHugh, who was drowned in the Arkansas River, near Canon City, on July 1, while playing the role of the heroine in "Across the Border," for the Colorado Motion Picture Company, has brought suit against that company for $5,000 damages. Mrs. Golby's attorney has been informed that Miss McHugh had contracted a romantic marriage some time before her death and had kept the fact secret from her friends and relatives.

It is claimed that the dead actress had carried her marriage certificate in her stocking to prevent the secret from leaking out, and that the document was found there after her death. It is also said that the Colorado Motion Picture Company has found the husband and secured from him complete releases from liability for the death of his wife.

Mrs. Golby, on the other hand, states that she was never informed by her daughter of this marriage and that she does not believe the statement is true, and also that if a marriage is claimed it is part of a plan to defeat her suit for damages.

In the complaint filed in the District Court by Mrs. Golby's attorney, the charge is made that the defendant company has benefited financially by Miss McHugh's death, because "in showing and displaying said motion picture, the fact that said Grace McHugh lost her life as the leading actress in said drama has been used by the defendant company in drawing the people to see said pictures."

Warning to Exhibitors.

The following letter has been received at the Chicago office from the Great Northern Manufacturing Co. of this city:

To protect your subscribers and owners of moving picture theaters in general throughout the United States, we take this means of notifying you that there is an individual purporting to represent us and calling on the owners or managers of moving picture theaters and taking orders for dinner ware and usually collecting some money in advance.

He is not connected with us in any way whatever, although he is using our name to obtain orders for dinnerware to be used for premium purposes. We enclose herewith a brief description of this party as given to us by two or three different parties, who claim to have been victimized.

The following description was sent in by the company, with the information that this man goes by the names of E. H. Boehm, Edward A. Bohn, Count Edward von Wallstatton, and E. V. Wall:

Height about 6 feet, 2 inches.
Complexion rather dark, brown eyes, dark hair.
Wore glasses at times.
Features: Finely chiseled and intelligent looking.
General appearance of a man of refinement and good breeding.
Second or third finger of right hand permanently closed.
A scar in middle of a rather high forehead.
A large lump near the back of the head, which is imperceptible to the eye but very noticeable to the touch.
Speech: Broken English.
Nationality: German or Austrian and can speak five different languages.

The Great Northern Co. states that the swindle has been carried on since January of the present year and that about fifty letters of complaint have been sent in to their places of business. Whether or not the company is responsible in a measure for the continuation of the swindling is a question. It is said that the man is now operating in the states of Indiana and Michigan.

Weigle War Pictures Popular.

The Weigle war pictures have been continued at the Studebaker for another week. Aaron Jones, of Jones, Linick & Schaefer, who control the Studebaker, says of last week's presentations:

"The attendance at the Studebaker last week absolutely passed our greatest expectations. When we booked the pictures we expected big crowds. We expected to reach the attendance record set by the Sarah Bernhardt production which played at the Studebaker, but the war pictures have played to nearly twice the number of people that attended the Bernhardt presentations.

"I believe a great number of people who saw the war pictures last week were sent to the Studebaker by friends who had previously seen them and who described some of the vivid scenes shown in the films. These are the first pictures of the actual fighting. Mr. Weigle is to be congratulated on his enterprise and daring."

Chicago Film Brevities.

Wm. N. Selig, president of the Selig Polyscope Co., returned to the city last Tuesday, after a four weeks' stay at the Edendale plant, Los Angeles.

Newman Traveltalks opened at Orchestra Hall Wednesday November 18, and will be continued until December 16. The talks cover the Holy Land, Riviera and Berlin.

"The Adventures of a Good Fellow," a Thanhouser production, was released here last week by District Manager R. C. Seery of the Mutual. The picture was in big demand, and was booked in many Chicago theaters during the week.

No further action was taken at the Chicago Council meeting on Monday evening, November 16, on the proposed ordinance outlined by Chief of Police Gleason for the segregation of men and women in moving picture theaters. It is believed that such a movement would be so unpopular that it would lead to the bearing of great pressure on both the mayor and the police department.

BENNETT AND REICHENBACH HAVE NEW JOBS.

H. Whitman Bennett, formerly associated with the Mutual Film Corporation, has been appointed director of publicity for the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company in place of Harry L. Reichenbach, resigned. Mr. Reichenbach has joined the Alco Company and will organize a complete advertising department for that concern.

Doings at Los Angeles.

DOINGS at Los Angeles! Big doings! That title suggests to the reader lots of happenings and what's going on out here. If you were here, and had gone the rounds of the studios this week you would, after typewriting that phrase, have but a kaleidoscopic jumble of ideas and thoughts suggested and shown by the wisp of notes and news paragraphs. This was indeed a big week. It is hard to start. There is so much really good news that to tell about production, progress, changes, or just news happenings, nearly stumps me. But we have no time to extend poor excuses for a delay.

Just as they came, they have gone. Jesse L. Lasky departed this week for the metropolis on the other coast, and Carl Laemmle, Universal, left for his headquarters in the east.

Fred Balshofer and Ford Sterling were found busily engaged in planning big improvements for their studio. A general overhauling will be given the plant. A typhoon will sweep away dressing rooms, debris diffusers, and a pile of junk. In place will be an addition of 5,000 square feet of stage. This nearly doubles the surface of working space, besides putting it out from under the trees and fences. Canvas covers will be used so that electric lights can be turned on when clouds obscure the sun. The whole studio is to be altered and enlarged, with a view to increased production, more efficient work, and better pictures in the long run.

Marshal Neilan has a new cameraman in the person of Roy F. Overbaugh, who for five years was chief of the photographic department for the American at Santa Barbara. He is chief cameraman here for the Kalem. Neilan is as busy as can be, doing funny pictures as usual, only they are unusual.

At a late hour news came that the famous Blanch Sweet, of Mutual fame, had joined the Lasky forces and would be at work there in the near future.

Rollin S. Sturgeon and his Vitagraph company are still isolated in Bear Valley waiting for the first snows of the year to arrive as props in their wintry scenes. They have already shot all the scenes laid in the summer, and now the snow is all that holds them back from getting the winter films. Sturgeon is doing "The Chalice of Courage," a feature play written especially for him in film form. His cast includes Margaret Gibson, Otto Lederer and other well-known westerners.

George Melford, directing Edith Taliaferro in a Lasky picture, is now at Catalina Island getting some sea scenes. He is already half finished with this picture, a comedy, from the machine of Wm. de Mille, who said that "this is an attempt to put light high-class comedy in pictures, and we are going to do it without a slap-stick." From all indications, the scenario man is correct, and the picture is going to be a good one.

"Owing to certain market conditions, and local production conditions, we were forced to stop work for a while, but about the tenth of December the Oz Film Co. will resume operations." That explains pretty well the present affairs at that studio. Mr. Baum is still to produce fairy tales, and dramas, and the studio ought to be busier than ever after its short stop.

Little Elsie Janis is a noble defender of old Britain, and at a dinner a few nights ago she was telling of her prowess with a rifle when a man near her said "The Kaiser'll be sending for you, Miss Janis."

"Hope he'll need me," she retorted.

The laughs followed, at the man's expense, and the merry little Bosworth actress sat back and laughed.

If ever anyone cared for a dog, it is Jack Kerrigan. The big star actor is mourning the loss of Pard, his faithful collie that was slaughtered yesterday by a motorist. Pard has been seen in many films, and had become quite a favorite.

When anything deserves credit, on its merits alone, it is right that it should be complimented, so here goes a boost for someone. At the Lasky studio for the "Girl of the Golden West" a few sets are up on the stage that are really beautiful. Detail and correctness have not been overlooked, and they were so good that a tip to fans to watch for the picture is not amiss. Also, in the Dutch scenes some realistic props have been made, which are fit for any picture. And at the Universal a back drop was made showing a wonderful scene in Algiers for the "Terrance O'Rourck" series. The scenic artist must have either been there or in Honolulu where the water shades are so pretty.

Victoria Forde, the pretty young leading miss of the Christy comedy company is being shown in "When Lizzie Got a Polish." She did not say whether it was a shoe shine, a nail polish, or some jet for the stove. Maybe it was just social "polish." Anyway she said it was funny.

Mr. and Mrs. Tally have returned from a northern trip. They went up to see the big football game between the colleges, and incidently to learn a few new ideas in the art of gathering in the picture lovers to their show houses here.

Hobart Bosworth is confined to bed, having been overtaken by an attack of nervous trouble. He will be able to work again shortly, a rest being the remedy most needed.

Had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Leslie Carter at the Tiffany Company's studio in the Oz grounds at Hollywood. Herbert Brenon was as busy as a bee, humming about the place, directing a scene here, ordering props there, and working at a 220-volt rate. Saw him direct the famous star in her first scene in "The Heart of Maryland" yesterday, and everything ran smoothly. Mrs. Carter said she liked the films, California, and her director. She is lending herself to the production, and can aid Mr. Brenon greatly with her experience from stage life with the same story. The company has leased a 1,200-acre ranch east of the city and will use it for coming big scenes. At the present a monster church is being built, with real doors, glass in the windows, and everything detailed to the smallest. The edifice is 30 by 60, and will be 70 feet high. It will later be blown up and burned in the battle scenes.

Dave Kirkland, at Sterlings, is doing one of the screamiest comedies ever. If a few scenes can be a sample of the thousand feet, the reel is a sure enough winner. Dave worked two nights and two days recently trimming up one of his comedies. Went around the cutting room door and only a growl could be gotten from him, which meant "no time for conversation, release calls for picture on time, late now, BEAT IT." Oh, for the life of a director. His cameraman, Harry Harris, is suffering from an attack of metal poisoning, but is able to hop about and turn the handle.

Imagine an all-star cast in a common, every-day mob scene. Donald Crisp; the snappy director of Mutuals, used everyone around the studio last Sunday morning in a mob scene because no extras were about. Several directors were used, as were some of the shining lights of the studio who happened to be there working in other pictures. Even a scenario man and one of the camera crankers were pressed into service. When the first run of the picture takes place, the whole Mutual outfit will be on hand to see themselves.

Every day and every hour it is proved beyond all doubt, as some of the big men say, "California is fast rising to the top in the production of moving pictures, and it will be but a short time until the east will be but the market place for films." The Universal, instead of sending its news notes to the east for printing in a syndicate publication, will issue the sheet here immediately. Copies will be mailed directly from here instead of New York, and the publicity department will be made a feature of the western plant.

"The Rosary," Selig's feature picture, is nearing completion, the company being at the Irish village in Redondo at the beach this week doing the final scenes.

Thomas H. Ince will soon combine business with fire protection by erecting and burning a building once a month, the flames to be registered by the camera and later put out by the fire department. Mr. Ince, since the fire of a few weeks ago, has concluded that an adequate and well drilled fire department is a necessity, and in consequence new apparatus and equipment have been added to the canyon studio department.

George Larkin, dare-devil of "Trey o' Hearts" fame, appeared at a local theater this week and caused much enthusiasm among the fans. He made a short speech and listened to cheers. He was presented with a handsome pair of diamond cuff links in appreciation for his appearance. The new Frank Lloyd company with Larkin and Gretchen Lederer is finishing the first picture, a startling story of gamblers of high class.

On Turkey Day we had some big races here, and among the spectators who saw the speed demons grinding off miles at the one hundred clip, was Frank B. Good, at the wheel of a camera for the Sterling company. Good was at one time a well-known race driver, and was only last year recruited into the film game. He was tutored by Harry Harris, Ford Sterling's star cameraman, and is now one of the best on the field. Good drove an Apperson in the recent Vanderbilt races at Santa Monica, and appeared first in a film for Robert T. Thornby in a Vitagraph production called "The Race."

Much is going on at Inceville these days. Preparations for winter; new and rocky roads completed; roofs being recovered; cafe cleanup; new people engaged, and a general air of ship-shapeliness put on. The county recently finished the coast road and now Incevillains can motor with ease to the camp from the city. Building operations are going on and everything is being made ready for winter with its balmy days interspersed with hours of rain. The restaurant has changed its tactics and is now under the supervision of Manager Allen, and already the people who used to tote lunches are casting shoe boxes to the road and eating at the studio.

Jesse L. Lasky has offered George Arliss, the great exponent of "Disraeli," an invitation to enter the field of the screen in the original role which he had in "The Darling of the Gods." Arliss has not yet concluded whether the square of canvass holds more for him than the square of boards with the row of footlights, and for that reason it is not known whether the great actor will acept the offer. However, the company intends staging this big play, taking a company to Japan for many of the scenes. "Cabiria" will be outdone, it is said, so spectacular will be this production.

Here is another example of why picture people come west. The Mutual has just completed a large frame building containing 100 dressing rooms. A big carpenter shop has been built, and is being fully equipped with mechanical devices for the remodelling of stage settings and properties.

Herbert Brenon is building a cemetery on the top of the earth to go with the church for "Heart of Maryland" with Mrs. Leslie Carter. The tombstones will be real, and a wierd scene will be that made in this setting. We know of at least three other graveyards, at least they seem dead enough, for we have written, requested, and beseeched the managers and writers for news. They are the American at Santa Barbara, which very cleverly says "All news comes from Chicago office;" the California company at San Francisco, and the Frontier at Santa Paula. The above epitaph will be eradicated if some one will please drop a line as to whether it is true or are you still alive.

Director Griffith, of the Mutual, recently became richer by $10, a prize hung up one foggy morning at the studio for the winner of a 100-yard dash. The aspiring athletes who coveted the ten fish were Eddie Dillon, Tod Browning, Max Davidson, Jack Adolfi, Jack O'Brien, Arthur Mackley, Sam deGrasse, Eugene Pallette, and Tam Young. Griffith won the prize with flying honors, too.

Here is a situation for you! At Inceville Director Charles Swickard is a sympathizer of the Kaiser, while Dick Stanton is on the other side! CLARKE IRVINE.

McGARVIE BACK TO THE EXPOSITION.

H. F. McGarvie, who for a time took an active interest in motion pictures in partnership with B. E. Clements, has returned to his first love in the show business—the Exposition. He has been appointed general manager of the Ottoman section of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition at San Francisco, by the Hon. Vahan Cardashian, the high commissioner of that section which will include all "Far East" exhibits.

Mr. McGarvie is one the best known and most successful concession managers in this country. He has had wide experience in shows of the character to be embraced in the Ottoman section. He left New York this past week to take up his headquarters at the Exposition grounds. Visitors to that even will find the Ottoman section a feature worth taking in.

Paramount House Organs

Elaborate Plans for Two Weekly Publications to Boost the Paramount Program.

WILLIAM W. HODKINSON, the president of the Paramount Pictures Corporation, announces an ambitious program of publicity for Paramount Pictures. The end of this publicity is to benefit the exhibitor who uses Paramount pictures and to make a general propaganda for Paramount pictures among all exhibitors.

"There will be," said Mr. Hodkinson to a reporter of The Moving Picture World, "two distinct publications. One will be a distinct house organ, and this will be the medium through which Paramount exhibitors each week discuss their problems and their experiences. While the publication will be intended exclusively for the Paramount exhibitors, I can assure you that no slighting references will be made to other persons or firms engaged in the motion picture industry. We hope, too, that this organ will do much toward making exhibitors appreciate their own individual strength. The publication will be an educational proposition. Data gathered from the whole field of experience will be submitted to the readers. The title of this publication will be 'Paramount Progress.' The publication will be issued weekly" Mr. Hodkinson himself will be the editor of this weekly, and enlightening contributions from his pen will be the leading feature of the paper. The first issue is to bear date of December 3.

"The other publication," continued Mr. Hodkinson, "is designed to attract and hold the attention of the general reading public, or at least that portion of it which patronizes theaters where Paramount pictures are shown. It will be distributed to this public specially, but we expect to reach the general public as well. The name of this publication will be 'The Paramount Weekly.' The first issue wil be ready for distribution on December 21.

"The magazine will contain much news and matter of direct interest to persons who patronize the Paramount Picture houses, but there will be supplemental material of great interest to the general public, such as fiction, fashion notes, home hints, hair-dressing, menus, pictorial department, and other subjects such as all high-class magazines carry. There is no desire on the part of the Paramount Pictures Corporation to make money out of this magazine. It will be furnished to the exhibitors at cost, which in the beginning will be one cent each. Charles P. Norcross, formerly associated with the Metropolitan Magazine, is to be the editor, and Proctor W. Hansl, one of the promoters of the Colonial Film Company, is to be his assistant."

Boston Theater for Pictures

W. E. Green Heads Company to Operate the Park Theater With Paramount Program.

VERY much importance is placed upon the opening about December first of the New Park Theater in Boston to be devoted exclusively to photoplays released through the Paramount Program. Recently W. E. Green, Moe Mark and several other associates, formed the Park Theater Company. Alterations were begun in the Park Theater, which is in the very heart of Boston, to turn this first-class playhouse into an ideal theater for the presentation of feature films.

Already $100,000 has been spent in renovating and remodeling the theater. The old gallery has been taken out and supplanted by a modern balcony; it has every convenience, even to the filtration of the air, which has been supplied to enable Boston to have a moving picture theater second to none in the United States. Special care has been taken to supply the patrons of this theater with the highest grade of music which will include a $25,000 Austin organ, which has been installed to augment the orchestra.

When it is remembered that Boston is the Mecca for all of New England and that most of its advantages and individual interests and social customs eminate in the Hub, the mere fact of such a photoplay house running such features as those of the Paramount Program will be apparent.

FILES PLANS FOR BIG HOUSE.

The Fairmont Amusement Company, of 300 Spingarn building, Jersey City, N. J., has filed with the Building Department of that city a set of plans calling for a vaudeville and moving picture theater with a seating capacity of 2,700. It is to be located on a plot of 7 lots on the corner of Monticello and Fairview avenues to replace the airdome which has been operated there for the past four years.

John Barrymore Vehicles

Famous Players Will Present Popular Star in "Are You a Mason?" and "The Dictator."

THE Famous Players Film Company has secured two noted stage successes, "Are You a Mason?" and "The Dictator," in which they will present their popular star, John Barrymore, who made his first appearance in motion pictures in the Famous Players' production, "An American Citizen," and who achieved an unusual comedy triumph in that company's recent release, "The Man from Mexico."

"Are You a Mason?" and "The Dictator" were selected as vehicles for Mr. Barrymore for the reason that they represent, more than any other comedies of a similar reputation, the type of dramatic humor best adapted to the inimitable talents of this star.

John Barrymore.

In "Are You a Mason?" by Leo Dietrichstein, Mr. Barrymore will portray the character of Frank Perry, a dashing young married man of exuberant spirits and vivid imagination. When his wife announces that her chief desire is to see him become a Mason, Perry grasps the opportunity to stay out several nights, explaining his absences from home by the statement that he is spending his evenings at the Masonic lodge, undergoing the ordeals of initiation. One night wife delightfully announces that her father, Grand Master of the Masons, is coming to visit them. Perry's agonized efforts to keep his father-in-law from discovering his deception, and the fearful tangles in which he becomes involved thereby, culminating in a situation which is one of the funniest climaxes ever conceived, go to furnish the humor of the farce, which is further heightened by the fact that the "Grand Master" himself has also deceived his family—is not a Mason, and is constantly manufacturing more deceptions to safeguard his first falsehood.

In "The Dictator," the celebrated adventurous romance by Richard Harding Davis, John Barrymore will appear as Brooke Travers, the central character, a young American who is forced by existing and exciting circumstances to become temporarily the dictator of a small republic in South America.

Mr. Barrymore should have opportunities in both these comedies for the display of his abilities, already recorded so satisfactorily on the screen.

EXHIBITORS' ALL FEATURE FILM COMPANY EXPLAINS.

In the issue of the Moving Picture World of November 21 was printed a letter from A. J. Cobe, of the Alliance Films Corporation, in which complaint was made that a company which he called the "Exhibitors' All Theater Film Company," located at Troy, N. Y., was quoting rental terms on pictures it did not control, including a subject owned by the Alliance, entitled "The Key to Yesterday."

Supplementing Mr. Cobe's letter, the Moving Picture World referred to other letters which embodied similar complaints of unauthorized quotations by the same company.

In a letter to the Moving Picture World the Exhibitors' All Feature Film Company claims that the charge against it of making "unauthorized quotations" is unwarranted; that, in fact, it did not make such quotations. What it did do was to issue a prospectus in which were listed certain pictures under the statement that, "Among the features already signed and under consideration are the following."

The Exhibitors' All Feature Film Company claims that it did have the pictures of the Alliance and other companies "under consideration" at the time the prospectus was issued, but that it decided not to take them. It also claims that the list given was not intended to be a list of the pictures it had for rent, but rather to show the class of pictures it intended to handle.

This statement would seem to absolve the Exhibitors' All Feature Film Company from unfair or false quotation on pictures it did not own or control. The company further states that it has no stock for sale to the general public and that it is conducting a legitimate business.

Blanche Sweet Engaged by Lasky

SAMUEL GOLDFISH announces that a contract has finally been concluded between the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company and Miss Blanche Sweet, whereby that famous film favorite will appear in the new series of Lasky-Belasco productions now being staged for the screen. Miss Sweet was selected by Mr. Belasco, and Cecil B. De Mille, for the Lasky-Belasco photo-productions, after an exhaustive study of the characteristics and abilities of all the more widely known young women now appearing in photodramatic presentations. Miss Sweet has signed a contract for a term of years at a record-breaking salary.

Blanche Sweet.

Blanche Sweet needs no introduction to lovers of photoplays, for, though she is only eighteen years of age, she has been making history in this art for several seasons. She is one of the most widely known photoplay actresses in the world. She first came into prominence on the screen as "Little Blanche," and it is perhaps her very early association with pantomimic expression which has helped to make her one of the world's foremost artists in the silent depicting of all emotions.

Up to the present time Blanche Sweet has been mainly associated with David Griffith, in most of whose leading productions she has appeared. She worked under Mr. Griffith while he was directing for the Biograph Company and played the title role of "Judith of Bethulia." More recently she has been working with Griffith for the Reliance and Majestic Companies, and has played the leading feminine roles in "Home Sweet Home," "The Avenging Conscience," "The Escape" and other film plays which have reached Broadway.

Mr. Goldfish announces that Miss Blanche Sweet will make her first appearance as a Lasky-Belasco star in William C. De Mille's famous success, "The Woman," which will be ready for release on February 15, and which played at the Republic Theater for two seasons. The production will be staged with the most elaborate care, and work will begin within a week.

ESTABROOK ADDS A "TOUCH" TO "OFFICER 666."

A certain part of Long Island society is smiling this week over the experience of a well known society Miss who found her way unexpectedly into several of the scenes in George Kleine's "Officer 666." The scenes were being taken on Long Island on a well-travelled thoroughfare, when Estabrook who had the character of a policeman at that period in the photo production, saw a young lady whom he knew well coming down the avenue in her raceabout.

Stepping out to the road, he lifted his hand and brought the car abruptly to a stop. After ordering her escort out to stop the smoke issuing from the rear of the car, he calmly took off his false mustache and disclosed the joke to her. Later on the young lady was persuaded to enact the little comedy over again for the camera, and it is one of the many pleasing bits in the picture version that will make "Officer 666" such a whole-hearted success.

"The Tell-Tale Hand"

An Essanay Three-Reel Western Mystery Photoplay by Frank Blighton, Featuring G. M. Anderson and Marguerite Clayton.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

IN THIS instance my review deals with a subject that has been submitted to the public and already received marked approval in many places where it has been presented, since the release date, Nov. 19. "The Tell-Tale Hand" has been produced in conjunction with the Ladies' World Magazine, the story of that name being written by Frank Blighton and published in the December number of the publication mentioned.

In it we have a typical western story, of the "Broncho Billy" brand, abounding in thrilling incidents and withholding the mysterious climax until nearly the end of the last chapter. The key to the mystery has been often used in stories of an entirely different type, but that does not rob this strong "Broncho Billy" photomelodrama of a single thrill.

It is quite a time since I have reviewed a "Broncho Billy" film, and for that reason, perhaps, I was an eager spectator of the wild scenes as they were unfolded. The break-neck speeding of horses along winding roads, the harsh atmosphere in which the men and women of the west moved some forty years and more ago, the triumph of the hero, the rescue of the innocent, fair maiden and the punishment of the "low-down" critter, who tried to send her to the gallows, had each a special appeal. The primitive court-room scene, in which a girl, innocent of crime, is convicted of murder, shows the grimness of the law's operation in those hardy days. The amateurish efforts of the sleuth-hero, and their success in tracing and condemning the real criminal, are witnessed with increasing interest until the net is drawn tight on the human jackal.

One is not disappointed if he expects to see "Broncho Billy" engage in some dare-devil stunts on horseback. That struggle between him and the real murderer in the case. Each shed of his shooting iron, while their horses ride neck and neck at terrific speed, makes one's breath come feverishly fast. The hand-to-hand conflict means a real loss of life or breaking of limbs, in case a mis-step is made by either mount; but "Broncho Billy" has his wonted luck and brings his man in to the sheriff, safe and sound, though sadly manhandled.

Miss Marguerite Clayton, one is glad to see, is given quite a part in the doings of these films. She is the most captivating criminal one has ever seen, and how the judge and jury could ever believe in her guilt will be a conundrum for all tender hearts. The villain of the story is forcefully impersonated by Lee Willard, and True Boardman is a typical western sheriff of the olden days.

The production has been carefully made and the action is spirited throughout, while the photography is clear, with good definition.

Annie Fango has miserable home surroundings. Motherless, she is beaten and uncared for by a good-for-nothing father. One day this unnatural father treats her so harshly that she flees from home, leaving in the hand of the enraged man, who had attempted to detain her, a shred of her dress. Tim Cantle, the villain of the story and an admirer of Annie, enters the cabin immediately afterwards. A quarrel follows and Peter Fango is stabbed to death. The murderer leaves a bloody imprint of his hand on the dead man's shirt, as he feels for a sign of life. Fear-stricken, he spies the piece of muslin torn from Annie's skirt, which the dead man still holds in his clenched hand. He seizes it and charges Annie with murder before a sheriff's posse.

In her flight Annie meets Broncho Billy who watches over her during a night on the mountain-side. Next day the posse finds her and she is placed in jail. A trial follows and she is found guilty.

Broncho Billy, having visited the scene of the murder, sees the tell-tale hand on the shirt of the dead man. He secures an imprint of Tim Cantle's hand on chemically sensitized paper, and accuses him of the crime. In the end Cantle confesses his guilt, Annie is released and "Broncho Billy" receives his reward.

Wallace MacDonald

ONE face on the new program which will speedily be recognized throughout the Photoplay world is that of Wallace MacDonald, the young actor with the compelling screen personality, who for the past year has been on the Mutual and Universal releases, always being cast for juvenile roles.

Wallace MacDonald.

He now graduates and will achieve an ambition in becoming leading man with the players working under the "Navajo" Brand.

He will once again be under the direction of the man who gave him his initial photoplay instruction one year ago, Mr. Charles K. French, and we can only see the greatest of success from such a combination.

Mr. MacDonald spells "Youth." His rise has been rapid. Born May 5, 1891, at Mulgrave, Nova Scotia. Three years of success on the legitimate stage served as good apprenticeship for the technique of the movies. Prominent member of the Los Angeles Photoplayers Club. "Watch for the Navajo."

HARRY MESTAYER TO PLAY LEAD IN "STOP THIEF."

George Kleine announces that Harry Mestayer has been secured to play the "lead" of the thief in his film version of George M. Cohan's and Sam H. Harris' famous comedy, "Stop Thief," work on which has already commenced at the George Kleine studio, 11 E. 14th street, New York. He will play opposite Mary Ryan, who will handle the role of the maid. These two stars will be assisted by a cast including Harold Howard, Della Connor, Marguerite Boyd, Soldine Powel, Mr. Tavernier, Mr. Boyd and Mrs. Burmeister. Mr. Mestayer will be remembered as the one who made a big hit throughout the country in the part of the thief under the Cohan & Harris management of the stage play.

C. JAY WILLIAMS JOINS VITAGRAPH.

C. Jay Williams, director of many successful comedies, has left the Universal to join the Vitagraph Co. For four years Mr. Williams was an Edison director. Among his comedies which met with unusual approval are, "Why Girls Leave Home," T. W. Robertson's "Caste," Chas. E. Van Loam's "A Good Sport," the "Wood B. Wedd" series by Mark Swan.

Among the Picture Theaters

The New Willis Wood Theater.

Lappe-Tighe Amusement Company Expends $50,000 in Remodeling Playhouse Into Big Picture Theater.

FOURTEEN years ago Col. Willis Wood opened the Willis Wood theater in Kansas City, Mo. At that time the theater was the finest in that city, if not in the West. For many years it was opened every season with the highest class of drama and musical comedy. But patronage began to wane, people were going to the picture theaters, and not to the legitimate theaters. So on October 10, last, the Lappe-Tighe Amusement Company opened the doors of the theater for the first time as a moving picture house. And never in the history of the house did such crowds attend. Four shows were given, and Henry B. Lappe, president of the Lappe-Tighe Amusement Company and manager of the Willis Wood theater, estimated that 8,000 people saw the show, and several thousand were turned away.

The fact that the Willis Wood theater was built fourteen years ago might leave the impression that it is old and past a point where it could be used for drama. But such is not the case. Among all the theaters built in recent years, there is probably not a single one that will surpass the remodeled Willis Wood in either elegance or beauty. As a matter of fact the company has simply used the building as a basis to make improvements; and the theater as it now stands could be called the New Willis Wood.

The exterior of the building has been treated with a preparation that gives it a rich creamy appearance. A massive copper canopy has been built out over the sidewalk at the entrance. The exterior is lighted at night by twenty-four 2,000 candle power lamps, placed in such a position that they throw the light directly on the building. The effect of the system can only be appreciated by seeing it; the building glows, the masonry seemingly charged with phosphoresence.

The interior has been decorated with a rich finish of ivory and brown, and higher tints in gold. The old plush-covered seats have been replaced by new leather-covered ones and new carpets have been laid. The stage has been entirely transformed, all of the old settings have been removed and a permanent setting built instead. In front of the screen is a lattice window which draws apart, disclosing a smaller curtain which when raised shows the screen. Standing in the center of the stage is a small electric fountain which operates during the intermission. Around this are banked hundreds of ferns and flowers. A row of ferns occupies the old footlights, and the orchestra pit is covered; balustrades are placed in such a manner as to leave the impression that they form a fence protecting the ferns and flowers on the stage.

Willis Wood Theater, Kansas City, Mo.

Beautiful Stage Setting of the Willis Wood Theater.

Back of the setting, a huge pipe organ has been built. The organ was made especially for this theater. The organ is also equipped with chimes, which are located at the top of the upper gallery. Besides the organ, the company has an orchestra of twenty-one pieces, led by E. C. Lewis, and by F. J. Kurth, formerly concert manager of the Kansas City Symphony Orchestra. The organ is played by B. J. Potter, associate of the Royal College of Organists, London.

One of the largest features of the reconstruction is the electrical work. L. A. Wagner has had charge of all this work, and many new features have been put in by him. The chief thing of interest is the huge chandelier that has been hung in the center of the dome. It is thirteen feet in diameter and fifteen feet high. It is built on the diffused lighting principle, and contains eighty lights ranging from 25 to 500 watts. There are 21 circuits of lights in it, which is more than is in the average theater. Mr. Wagner also had charge of the construction and planning of the operating booth which contains two Powers 6A projectors, one double dissolver and one spot light. Two twenty-four inch vent fans keep the operating room cool.

In round numbers the company has spent $50,000 in the reconstruction of the building, and it is one of the finest moving picture houses in the west. They are charging 10, 20 and 25 cents.

Henry B. Lappe.

H. B. Lappe, president of the company and manager of the theater, is a native of Germany and served a year in the Thirteenth Infantry Regiment of that country. In 1889 he was obsessed with the desire to come to America, the consequences being that shortly afterward he was employed in New York City as an assistant to a crew of laborers putting on tar roofs at a wage of ten dollars a week. After drifting about the country several years he settled down in Kansas City, and, with Winthrop Allen, formed the Standard Roofing Company. Success smiled on the venture, and in a short time both men were well upon the road to prosperity. However, fate did not intend Mr. Lappe should remain in the roofing business, for an accident forced him to give up that business. He was kicked by a horse and his arm was broken in five places, and it became impossible for him to carry on his work, because he only regained partial use of it.

At that time the moving picture business was in its infancy, and Mr. Lappe saw great opportunities in it. He built the Mystic Theater at Thirty-first and Main streets, Kansas City, and operated it only three months when he sold it and opened the Palace Theater at Tenth and Main, also in Kansas City. From a financial standpoint this is probably the best theater in town being in the heart of the business district. In 1910 he took a lease on a building at 15 West Tenth street, in the heart of the banking district. Here he built what was then the finest theater in the city. It was called the Tenth Street Theater and was the first theater to have the indirect system of lighting and a pipe organ. Mr. Allen, his former partner in the roofing business, became interested in the moving picture business, and the two organized the Standard Amusement Company, using the name "Standard."

Joseph Gilday.

Two years later the company took over the Twelfth street theater which seats 730. In July of 1914 Mr. Lappe and his brother-in-law, who is a prominent hay merchant, H. F. Tighe, organized the Lappe-Tighe Amusement Company and took charge of the present Willis Wood.

Joseph Gilday, who is booking manager for the Lappe-Tighe Amusement Company as well as the Standard Amusement Company, "broke into the game" eight years ago when he opened the Linwood Theater at Thirty-third and Troost. Soon afterward he opened the first open-air theater at Thirty-first and Troost. Later he was connected with the Illiad Amusement Company. But last March he sold his stock in this company and took the management of the Twelfth Street Theater, owned by the Standard Amusement Company. Several months later he acted as an agent and sold the Broadmour Theater, which he had previouslly managed while with the Illiad Amusement Company, to the Standard. He was then given the management of the Broadmour which he retained until taking his present position.

COLONIAL THEATER, FAIRMONT, W. VA.

A Clear Perception of Public Needs Is Secret of McCray Theater Company's Success.

THE Colonial theater, McCray Theater Company, Inc., proprietors, Fairmont, W. Va., is one of the best exclusive moving picture theaters in the Middle Atlantic States. It was opened December 12, 1911, at an outlay of $60,000. The auditorium proper is reached through two large glass doors, trimmed with brass, and the interior decorations are in various hues of red and yellow. The seats are roomy and are upholstered in leather. Red hangings and stucco ornaments, under the subdued interior light, give the interior a beautiful and restful appearance. The auditorium has accommodations for 600 persons. The angle of the floor brings the screen in a direct line with the eye of each spectator so the craning of necks is unnecessary and the view of no one is obstructed by the person in front of them.

The screen is about twenty-five feet from the first row of seats, making all seats equally desirable. The aisles are wide, and the seats so placed as to give ample room for each person in the auditorium, the idea at all times being, comfort first. The music is furnished by a $1,500 Peerless Photoplayer Orchestrion. A cooling, heating and ventilating system has been installed which insures the house being comfortable at all times. The power is furnished by its own lighting plant.

The projection room in which are installed two Motiographs is practically fireproof, as is the theater, which has nine exits, exclusive of the front doors. A unique feature of these exit doors is that the upper panels of each are removable and can be taken out and replaced in five minutes without opening the doors proper. The use of these openings in warm weather, in connection with the fan system, makes the house cooler and pleasanter than outdoors.

Frank C. McCray and Richard Earl McCray, who have dictated the policies of this house since its opening, intended to run vaudeville and pictures, but after opening with pictures to packed houses soon decided that it would be foolishness not to let well enough alone and give it to the popular demand, so it has been pictures ever since. The continued prosperity of the Colonial is due largely to the policy of the management of running only high-class pictures and catering to the comfort and amusement of the public at all times. The Colonial gives a continuous entertainment from eleven to eleven and the admission is five and ten cents all the time.

The McCray Theater Company, Inc., is composed of R. E. McCray, president; M. B. Criss, treasurer; Charles E. McCray, Jr., secretary; George J. Fletcher and Frank C. McCray, who is vice-president and general manager.

NEW EMPIRE, DETROIT, MICH.

B. Harlan Starr, Well Known Detroit Picture Man, at the Helm of New Empire.

THE New Empire theater on Woodward avenue near State street, Detroit, Mich., in the heart of the shopping district, is generally considered as in a class by itself among Detroit's photoplay houses. It is not only regarded as one of the most beautiful theaters in the Middle West, but it is the only stageless theater in Detroit, the picture screen being directly against the rear wall of the building on which is formed the proscenium opening which acts as a frame for the shadow-box around the screen.

B. Harlan Starr.

The pipe organ loft is located directly above the orchestra pit in the space formed between the inclined sounding board and the line of the main ceiling. A unique feature of the theater is the provision for allowing the sound to pass from the organ loft into the auditorium. This provision consists of a series of large elliptical openings through the sounding board, behind each of which is an inverted plaster bowl of a corresponding elliptical shape, filling the opening as far as the eye can detect, but allowing the sound to pass around the edge of the bowl and into the auditorium. The effect is heightened by an arrangement of concealed electric lamps, lighting the bowls in delicately tinted shades of color reminding one of a setting of immense jewels.

The theatrical "atmosphere" of the interior of the theater is enhanced by the illusion of boxes, and a balcony front extending across the auditorium between the boxes. This effect, however, is due to a "fake," since there is no balcony, while the boxes are purely ornamental and inaccessible without the use of a ladder, the seating capacity being entirely confined to the orchestra floor, which is on the street level, and accommodates 600 persons.

The lighting of the theater is entirely of the indirect principal, and is specially arranged with a view to bringing out the simple but effective decorative scheme suggestive of refinement and quiet elegance. All the appointments of the theater are of the most complete and up-to-date order.

Fuller Claflin, the architect of the New Empire, regards the structure as among the best of the many theaters he has built throughout the country, and believes it would be difficult to conceive a better photoplay house of a similar size.

But what would a beautiful house of this kind amount to without the right sort of management? The New Empire has a "star" in the person of B. Harlan Starr, who is one of the best known men in the local industry. He is the type of man you can't help liking. He was formerly manager of the Old Empire at the same location when it had a seating capacity of about 300. Today it is 600. He has had experience in every branch of the amusement business, having been advance agent for many of the best legitimate productions as well as the "white tops." He has been associated with A. J. Gillingham, proprietor of the New Empire, for the past seven years, having handled state right productions for Mr. Gillingham previous to his assuming charge of the New Empire some three years ago. He derived his first experience in the moving picture industry while lecturing with Passion Play pictures through the eastern states. He saw opportunities in the business and immediately became an enthusiast. Today he can talk intelligently and authoritatively on any phase of the moving picture industry. He attributes a great deal of his knowledge in the business to the fact that he has always been a constant reader of the Moving Picture World. He says he finds something of interest on every page, whether it's advertising or straight reading matter.

The New Empire has a six-piece orchestra, besides daily pipe organ recitals. All seats are ten cents and the program is changed daily. Mr. Starr selects all his own pictures. He reads the synopsis of every picture—and sees all of them—before he puts them on. He aims to show only such pictures as will please the large following and clientele which the New Empire has built up. Features are shown three days a week; the other four days are given to General Film service. The New Empire is the only ten-cent picture theater south of Grand Circus Park on Woodward avenue.

GRAUMAN'S IMPERIAL THEATER, SAN FRANCISCO.

THIS theater is constructed entirely of steel and concrete and is as nearly fireproof as modern building construction permits. While it was in course of erection most of those who saw it believed that it was designed for the legitimate drama, not having been accustomed to see such expensive features incorporated in an exclusive moving picture house. It was opened on December 24, 1912.

The seating capacity of the house is sixteen hundred and fifty. Its appointments are of a high order, with fine opera chairs, draperies and decorative features seen in but few theaters. One of the attractive features of the house is the music, which is rendered by an orchestra of seven pieces and an organ.

Since the opening week D. J. Grauman, sole owner, has spared neither expense nor effort to present pictures of the highest standard. There is no film production too large or too costly for the Imperial to handle. Manager J. A. Partington has recently signed a three years' contract with the Paramount Film Corporation for the exclusive San Francisco exhibition rights of all of its future releases.

This theater uses but very little in the line of posters in its lobby, advertising here mostly with photographs, but conducts an extensive billboard campaign and advertises in the daily press. Some of its advertising work is along unusual lines.

PENN GARDENS, WASHINGTON, D. C.

New Fireproof Motion Picture House Is Exquisite in Architecture—Has Adjoining Concrete Airdome.

THE new Penn Gardens, situated at the corner of Pennsylvania avenue and Twenty-First street, Northwest, Washington, D. C., were opened a few weeks ago. The Gardens include an open-air motion picture park with a seating capacity of about 1,600 persons, and an inclosed house with a seating capacity of about 500. In addition to these there is a large refreshment room and a bowling alley and billiard room will soon be added. The structure is of brick and is fireproof throughout. The exterior, which is quite ornamental, has been given a pebble-dashed finish and is decorated with circles made of electric lights. On the Pennsylvania avenue side, the name "Penn Gardens" is outlined in electric lamps. Entrance is gained to the theater from both streets by means of a short flight of concrete steps. The lobby is paved with terra cotta tiling and this flooring is continued within the house, where it covers that space utilized as a foyer and the aisles. Tn elaborate ticket office, with four windows for quick service to patrons, is in the center of the lobby. This is very large and is of marble to the height of the counter, above which it is of heavy plate glass. To the right is a double entrance with mahogany swinging doors and to the left is a double exit. The ceiling of a t metal is very elaborately decorated in blue and gold leaf and from it is suspended a series of gilt chain hung electric lamps. Near the ceiling ten windows have been cut in the two walls and fitted with glass stained in imitation of onyx. Between these are gilt heads in bas relief. Over the entrances and exits to the foyer are golden eagles perched on American shields placed within draped flags. A further attraction are the flower boxes, with red poinsettias and salvia and low-hanging vines, with which each window is equipped.

Entering the theater proper, one is immediately impressed with its beauty, for evidently money was not spared in its decoration. The foyer has a width of more than fifteen feet and is inclosed by heavy brass rails. The ceiling is of the same type as is in the lobby and from it is suspended eight large electric fixtures. A further novel lighting effect is obtained from lamps set within grotesque heads of frosted glass inclosed within golden wreaths. The comfortable seats are placed on a concrete floor. On each side are three exits and in addition to these, exit into the park is to be had through the two toilet rooms provided for the convenience of patrons. These rooms are perfectly sanitary and well equipped. Six radiators furnish heat for the theater proper, while there are two more in the lobby. Both heating and ventilating plants are of the best.

A mezzanine floor runs the width of the house and of the foyer, and entrance to it is gained by ascending a flight of iron stairs, another fireproof feature. At the head of the stairs at the left is a handsome box which will accommodate a large number of people and is to be used by guests of the owners. The floor is of terra cotta tile and is carpeted. The lighting is by means of side lights similar to those on the walls of the theater proper. Just beyond this is the projection room for the park, which is soon to be equipped with two motor-driven Simplex machines. Two of these machines are now in operation in a room at the right of the stairway. Beyond this is the manager's office. With the exception of the operating room, where the ceiling and walls are of a deep blue, and the lobby, the baseboard of which is of marble, the walls are enameled white, with lower sections marked off to represent tiling.

With separate operating rooms and machines for both the park and the house, both can be operated at the same time and protection is also had to the business during inclement weather. The park itself is the largest in the city. The walks are all paved with the terra cotta tiling, while the benches are placed on graveled spaces. At the rear of the benches is a space which is soon to be floored over with maple for use as a dancing pavilion. This is to be protected by a roof of metal and glass. The park screen has been laid on a brick wall erected for that purpose.

E. K. Fox, a prominent real estate operator of this city, is the owner of the property. To erect the theater necessitated the demolition of a block of houses, and all told there is here represented an almost fabulous investment. It is one of the only amusement places of its kind in the city and from the start a good attendance has been had at each show. George Schultz is the manager of the house and assisting him is a corps of four young lady ushers. A matron is also present at all times when the house is open.

WASHINGTON THEATER, WASHINGTON, D. C.

ANOTHER of the very attractive theaters of Washington, D. C., is the Washington, located near the corner of Eighteenth and U streets, Northwest, in the center of one of the most exclusive sections of the city. It is operated under the management of Austin H. Brown, in connection with a large airdome on adjoining ground.

The Washington Theater itself has accommodations for about four hundred persons, while the capacity of the airdome is about eight hundred. The building is of brick with a front decorated in cement. On each side of the entrance is a massive Corinthian column. The outer lobby is paved with stone and bordered with mosaic blocks. The box office is bow shaped and above is the booth. The windows of the office and those located over the two entrances at the front and the two exits at the rear are of leaded stained glass. The ceiling of the lobby, like that of the theater proper, is of green art metal; the walls are of a buff color.

The flooring of the interior is also of stone; the baseboard running to the height of the top of the chairs is of metal and finished to look like mahogany. In the ceiling over the central section of the theater are two gilt decorations from which are two ornamental electric lamps of the direct-indirect type suspended by gilt chains. Between the two is a large vent, the outlet of a chute the other end of which is near a 3 h. p. fan sending in about 7,000 cubic feet of pure air a minute. On each side are three smaller outlets which with the windows, expel the impure air. The walls are buff colored and decorated with squares of green, matching the color of the ceiling. The operating booth has just been re-equipped and the old machines have been replaced with two motor-driven Power's 6A machines.

LEASES BURKE THEATER.

Walter M. Burke, owner of the Burke theater in Market Square, Kenosha, Wis., closed a deal recently by which that theater was leased to the Joplin-Stutzman Amusement Company for a term of years; the new managers of the theater took possession at once. The theater will be closed and redecorated. The new managers have had long experience in the picture business.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

WE often hear complaints, from ministers and others, as to the effect of the motion picture show upon church attendance on Sunday evenings. These are not restricted to any one locality; they crop up in newspapers from all over the land. It is possible that the motion picture is responsible for reduced attendance in many instances; it is likewise possible that on the picture as an entertainment is laid blame for which it is in no wise responsible. It may be that ministers themselves are partly responsible for slim attendance. In church matters the average male person even more than the average female person seeks entertainment—entertainment in the broad sense that he desires to be interested and instructed, stimulated and stirred. Many men there are who will attend church regardless of what they may there find; they will go as a matter of duty, because of a belief that it is the right thing, the best thing and the only thing for them to do. Others will go to church for reasons entirely apart from those inspired by religious sentiment; in all likelihood there will be a preacher who by his eloquence can move and hold, or there may be exceptionally good music.

The writer on a recent Sunday evening witnessed a striking instance of how the crowd does not always follow the theater and ignore the church. It was 6 o'clock, an hour and a half before the opening of the church services he wished to attend. A picture theater would fill the gap, and several houses were in the immediate vicinity. One, a new structure, caught the eye. Here was an announcement of nine reels for five cents. The posters indicated a joint licensed and Mutual program. There was even a Mary Pickford reissue. In doubt as to the possibility of securing a seat under such circumstances curiosity overbore discretion and he went in. A house seating 600 was one-third filled. The place was new and comfortable; the program was good. The admission was dirt cheap—inexcusably cheap. What was the matter?

For an answer we had not long to wait. In one part of the theater a child began to cry. It kept on crying, loudly. Surely the woman in charge of it, presumably its mother, would take it out until it was quiet or at least one of the ushers would suggest the advisability of that course. The woman in charge of the infant seemed the least concerned in the place. No usher appeared. The squalling continued many minutes. As the crying ceased a child began running up and down one of the aisles. Not to be outdone in this most entertaining of indoor sports another child in another aisle got into the game. Then for many seconds the light on the screen faded until it was almost indistinguishable. At 7.30 the house was half filled.

The answer? The proprietor of the house was not, could not be, an exhibitor. He did not know his business. If he did his first thought would be that every patron in his house had a chance to see his program undisturbed. He would have had some one in the auditorium at all times, with eyes to see and ears to hear. The attempt to convert his house into a nursery would have been nipped even as it began. If the operator had so much to do he was not at all times able to project a clear picture assistance would have been given him. Small wonder the price of admission to this fine house was five cents.

Two blocks away was a church seating two thousand persons. By 7.40 practically every seat was filled. The musical program was the same as usual. The preacher, too, was the same as usual, but he is by no means a usual preacher. In other words, he is an unusual preacher—of broad knowledge and wide sympathy and marked eloquence. It was in the man himself that lay the magnet drawing on a misty night from comfortable firesides this great throng.

It is unfair to assume that sometimes the cause for poor Sunday evening church attendance is partly to be found in the minister himself?

Out in Kalamazoo, Mich., the question of Sunday opening of picture theaters has for years been a bone of contention. The matter was submitted to the voters at the recent election, with the result that the theaters will in the future be opened on Sunday. The majority in favor of this course was 117. Among the opponents to the proposed step was the Mayor. Submission of the question of Sunday opening to popular vote seems a rational way of putting out of the realm of controversy a problem prolific of bitter controversy.

A program recently shown at a benefit for the Parent-Teachers' Association of Glendale, Cal., was as follows: "The Cocoanut Industry," "A Trip Through Brazil," "Niagara in Winter," "California Before the Gringo Came," "John Bunny Buys His Wife a New Hat" and "The Wizard of Oz." The proceeds of the show, which was given at the Majestic Theater, were devoted to equipping a local schoolhouse with lights.

William Russell in the Famous Players' release of "The Straight Road," did some work with his fists, which gave the best evidence of particular ability in the way of "handling his mits." It is a fact that Mr. Russell is an accomplished boxer. By the way, one of the characters in the scenes of the training quarters seemed a veritable "white hope," being considerably in excess of six feet in height. The pugilistic atmosphere in "The Straight Road" was unusual.

Thomas Saxe, who, in Milwaukee, shows 'em how to put on pictures right, has just returned home from a visit to New York, in which he was accompanied by Mr. Barnett, Senior, of the Famous Players Star Feature Film Service. Interviewed by the Milwaukee Journal, Mr. Saxe said that he had taken the trip primarily to protest against the increasing cost of good pictures to the exhibitor. He returns convinced by interviews with several manufacturers that the changing conditions are justified by the demands of the theatergoing public.

William Welsh, who will be remembered as Father Neptune in "Neptune's Daughter" and who also has done excellent work in many other Imp productions, got a bad fall at the Imp studio last week. Mr. Welsh was doing a stunt on a horizontal bar when unaccountably he lost his hold and fell to the ground. Mattresses had been placed under the bar, but in falling he went beyond the protection and struck his head on the pavement. It was a long time before a doctor could bring him around. The injured man was taken home, where he remained two days. He is all right now, and in high good humor. Following his return to the studio Mr. Welsh and Manager Stern exchanged signatures on a document which insures Mr. Welsh's appearance in Imp productions for another year, and apparently on terms mutually satisfactory.

Eddie Dillon, with his "Bill" stuff, is putting over some good ones. Fay Tincher is Komic enough to suit anybody—except, of course, supersensitive stenographers. By the way, can it be possible it has been her characterization that has so thoroughly aroused the ire of the Los Angeles stenographers? Fie! If it be true that Miss Tincher is aimed at the young women of the Western city display a lamentable lack of sense of humor.

It took Manager Grove Willard, of the Beecher Moving Picture Theater of Grand Rapids, Mich., less than one minute to empty his crowded house recently when it was reported to him that there was a fire in the basement. From the stage he announced the fact and said that, while the house was fireproof, perhaps it were better that everyone leave. The suggestion was acted on with celerity, but without disorder. The blaze, which did $200 damage, was promptly extinguished by the firemen.

According to the Philadelphia newspapers it was necessary to call out the reserves to restrain the throng that recently assembled in front of the Market Street Theater to greet Mary Pickford. Miss Pickford was accompanied by Director James Kirkwood and President Zukor of the Famous Players. Also in the party were Stanley Mastbaum, theater man, and William Smith, exchange man. The appearance was coincident with the showing of "Behind the Scenes." Later there was an informal dinner at the Bellevue-Stratford, at which Miss Pickford spoke.

The Minneapolis Tribune has been inviting letters from children as to their preferences in motion pictures. From 1,200 responses it appears that first on the list are comic pictures, rather an indefinite classification, with western dramas second. Charles B. Newton, of the Drama League of Minneapolis, reports that in San Francisco the order was reversed. Mr. Newton says it is the intention to exhibit model programs for children, and that in Minneapolis five theaters have agreed to co-operate with the league. If the experimental showings prove successful the work will be extended.

Motion Picture Laws*

Collated by W. Stephen Bush.

Delaware.

The laws of Delaware require that "all person or persons, firm, company or corporation * * * conducting or exhibiting a motion picture theater shall first obtain a proper license therefor." Application for a license must be made to "the Clerk of the Peace of any County."

Sections 9 and 10 of the law relating to licensing of amusements provide as follows:

Section 9. For each license to conduct or exhibit a theater or a moving picture theater within the corporate limits of any city in this State, having a population of over fifty thousand people, a fee of One Hundred Dollars ($100) shall be paid to the Clerk of the Peace for the use of the State.

Section 10. For each license to conduct or exhibit a theater or a moving picture theater within the corporate limits of any city, village or town in this State, having a population of less than fifty thousand people a fee of Twenty-five Dollars shall be paid to the Clerk of the Peace for the use of the State.

Contrary to the prevailing laws on the subject in other states, a license in Delaware is not cancelled by the death of the licensee, but "it shall be lawful during the life of the license for the executors or administrators of the licensee to carry on the business." In addition to the license fee a special fee of fifty cents is to be paid to the Clerk of the Peace who issues the license.

District of Columbia.

The provisions referring to motion picture theaters situated within the District of Columbia are as follows:

No place of cheap amusement such as five and ten cent theaters, moving picture shows and the like, shall be established or maintained, nor shall a theater of any kind be established or maintained except upon a permit therefor to be issued by the Building Inspector.

No such permit shall be issued for the establishment or maintenance of such place of amusement or theater which place or theater is within the fire limits and which is not upon a street or portion thereof designated as a business street in the schedule of business streets in the Building Regulations, except upon written application accompanied by the written consents of persons owning a majority in frontage feet of the real estate and a majority of the actual resident housekeepers on the same side of the square on which it is desired to establish or maintain said place of amusement or theater and also the written consents of two like majorities of the persons owning real estate and actual resident housekeepers on the confronting side or sides of the square of amusement or theater. Where the said place of amusement or theater is to be established or maintained on the corner of a square, whether entrance to the same is to be on one or both of the streets adjacent to the said corner, then and in that event, no permit shall be issued except upon the written consent of all of the several majorities of the persons which would be necessary for the establishment or maintenance of two such places of amusement, one on each of the said two sides of said square. Corner property, one face of which is on the side of a square involved, shall be included in computing the necessary majorities of owners and housekeepers, but no property shall be included twice in such computation; and where consents of owners and housekeepers on two sides of a square are necessary, each corner property shall be included within the side upon which it fronts. "Any one whose signature may have been obtained in accordance with the above provisions may withdraw his or her consent to the establishment of such place of amusement any time prior to the issuance of the permit therefor."

Florida.

The laws of Florida, as will be seen in the subjoined extracts from "the License Laws of the State of Florida," make a distinction between "Traveling and Permanent Moving Pictures Shows." Here is the text of the provision:

Traveling Moving Picture Shows in buildings or tents shall pay a license tax for each day as follows: In cities and towns of 10,000 inhabitants or more shall pay a license tax of twenty-five ($25.00) dollars, in cities and towns of less than 10,000 inhabitants, fifteen ($15.00) dollars; Provided if they have any other features than moving pictures they shall be subject to the license tax as otherwise provided for shows.

Provided, That owners or managers of theaters or halls, employing traveling troupes, theatrical, operatic or minstrel, giving performances in buildings fitted up for such purposes, or moving picture shows giving exhibitions in buildings permanently used for such purpose, shall be allowed to give as many performances or exhibitions in such building or theater as they wish on payment of the following license:

In cities or towns of twenty thousand inhabitants or more, shall pay a license tax of two hundred ($200.00) dollars per annum.

In cities (and towns) of less than twenty thousand and more than fifteen thousand inhabitants, shall pay a license tax of one hundred and fifty ($150.00) dollars per annum.

In cities and towns of less than fifteen thousand and more than ten thousand inhabitants, shall pay a license tax of one hundred ($100.00) dollars per annum.

In cities and towns of less than ten thousand and more than five thousand inhabitants shall pay a license tax of fifty ($50.00) dollars per annum.

In cities and towns of less than five thousand inhabitants shall pay a license tax of ten ($10.00) dollars per annum.

Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to local amateur performances; Provided further, that this Act shall not apply to any hall owned or used by any charitable or fraternal organization giving performances or exhibitions for their own benefit.

Georgia.

The only references to motion pictures in the law of Georgia are contained in "The General Tax Act 1914 of the State of Georgia," from which we quote the following:

Upon each and every electric show or exhibition of moving pictures, or illustrated songs, and each place where vaudeville performances are given either with or without electric shows or moving pictures, the sum of ten dollars per month for each place of business (the same amount of tax shall be required for a part of a month where they may operate or exhibit for a less period). This tax must be paid monthly in advance.

Idaho.

The motion picture in this state comes under the general statutes which govern the conduct of theaters and amusements.

Illinois.

Motion picture theaters in the State of Illinois are not subject to State supervision or regulation. In the principal cities regulations such as here subjoined prevail:

The Fires Marshal's Department of the State of Illinois prescribes certain requirements regulating the installation and equipment of moving picture machines. The text of these requirements reads as follows:

1. Every picture machine installed or operated in the State of Illinois shall be inclosed within a booth, to be not less than 5 feet x 5 feet x 6 feet in size, the frame of which shall be composed of angle iron not less than one inch by one-eighth inch, properly braced to secure rigidity and securely riveted or bolted at the joints. Every such booth shall be sheathed and roofed with sheet iron of not less than No. 20 B. and S. Gauge, or with one-quarter inch hard asbestos board, to be securely riveted or bolted to the angle iron frame.

2. The booth shall be floored with the same material as the side and roof, riveted to the iron frame and covered with some non-conducting material.

3. The entrance door into the booth shall be no larger than 2 feet by 5 feet, of the same construction as the booth and so arranged as to close automatically by metal rope and weight attachment, or by a spring of sufficient strength and tension to keep the door securely closed.

4. The orifice or opening for the operator's view, or through which the picture is thrown, shall not be larger than 12 inches and shall be provided with a gravity door of the same construction as the booth, which door shall be held open by fusible links placed in series with fine cords, so arranged that one of the links is suspended directly over the film when in the slide of the apparatus, or arranged so as to be normally closed and held open by pressure of the operator's foot.

5. All shelves, furniture and fixtures within the booth shall be constructed of a non-combustible material and no combustible material of any sort whatever shall be permitted or allowed to be within such booth, except the films used in the operation of the machine.

6. All picture machines shall be equipped with incombustible magazines for receiving and delivering the films during the operation of the machines. A shutter must be provided and placed in front of the condenser of the machine, so arranged that the same can be instantly closed by the operator. Films not in the machine shall be kept in metal boxes, with tight-fitting covers, within the booth enclosing the machine. Hot carbons taken from the lamps shall be deposited in a metal receptacle.

7. Each booth must have an opening, not less than 12 inches in diameter for ventilation, which must be flanged to carry standard conductor pipe for exhausting the hot air generated in operating the machine.

NOTE.—If possible, connection for ventilation should vent to chimney or outside of building, in order to carry off hot air or explosive gases.

8. Each exit from a moving picture theater shall be marked with a red signal light and shall be marked "EXIT" in letters not less than 5 inches in height.

9. Two standard hand chemical fire extinguishers shall be provided, one inside the booth and the other located outside the booth near the door of the same.

10. No other opening into the booth except those specified above will be permitted.

REGENT AT RICHMOND CLOSED.

Difficulties arising from financial matters, it is understood, has caused the management of the Regent motion picture theater, Broad street, between Eighth and Ninth, Richmond, Va., to suspend business and its doors were closed. Suits against the theater, which is operated by the Southern Photoplay Company, Inc., a foreign corporation, caused the sheriff to levy, and it is learned that further legal steps may be expected. This picture playhouse was first known as the Lubin, later the Orpheum, and now the Regent.

NEW YORK OPERATORS BALL.

On the night of Saturday, November 7, Local Union No. 306 gave its annual ball at Palm Garden, as per the announcement made in these columns some time ago. The affair was, as predicted, a success, both socially and financially, the only drawback being that Palm Garden, large as it is, was too small to hold the assembled multitude in comfort. The dancing floor was crowded until after midnight—so much so that dancing was not a thing of joy, but, rather, a bumpety-bump process. The union no doubt, however, will take warning, and next year secure a larger hall, although Palm Garden is not by any manner of means a small place. The committees are entitled to much credit for their able efforts.

Several outside unions sent delegations in response to invitations extended by Local 306. Brothers W. G. Murray and James Gavey represented Local 307 from the City of Brotherly Love, and they represented it mighty well, too. Local 359, Trenton, N. J., was represented by Benj. Seegle, and Harry Poise, who were there with their hair in two distinct braids, and did honor to their local and to the occasion.

Moving Picture Educator

Conducted by the REV. W. H. JACKSON

AN EXPERIMENT AND ITS RESULTS.

THE writer of this page recently had an opportunity of watching the results of the installation of a moving picture equipment in a suburban high school. While there has been much preliminary talk as to the probabilities and possibilities of the outcome of the introduction of moving pictures, no one seemed to have any definite idea as to the real value of the work or the possible outcome. One thing was determined, however, by the Men's League of the community, that was that a definite start should be made. A Powers No. 5 machine with suitable booth mounted on a movable stand was installed and a beginning made.

If ever anyone started a ball rolling that could not be stopped, or put in motion a movement which could not be arrested, here was such an instance. At once the great auditorium was crowded—an exhibition in the high school brought out whole families; indeed, everybody would go, when only a sprinkling would think of going to the little picture house; it just seemed as if the whole community were waiting for such an opportunity. It is interesting thus to tabulate the results.

First—It is abundantly proved that to such a place as a high school auditorium the whole community, seemingly without any exception, will immediately go.

Second—There is no question arising either as to the suitability of the place, the nature of the program or the class of people there. The place is an ideal one, the program is surely a safe and sane one, and the people are the scholars and their parents, every one's neighbors and no class distinctions arise under the equality of one common elevating idea.

Third.—An astonishing opening up and widening of the influence to the whole community of the higher ideals consequent upon a universal appeal to the highest and best effects of a combined educational, interesting and amusing attraction.

Fourth.—The great social uplift found by such an unusual "getting together" is really a revelation. No church sociable, no civic reception, no community appeal in itself possessed all the compelling attractions that were found to exist in a moving picture entertainment in the common center of the community.

Fifth.—The universal benefits were at once revealed. Because of the fact that every child at school became an advertising agent, every home was pressed into one common relationship, from all classes, father and mother and older children became unified in the common idea, and those who could not go, or those who would not go to a moving picture show were at once found in attendance and to many it was like another going to a higher high school as benefits not anticipated were unconsciously received.

Sixth.—All oppositions, antipathies, parental or ministerial criticisms at once died a natural death. What was there to oppose? What was there to dislike? What was there to criticise? Nothing; absolutely nothing. The ministers and their families went side by side with the janitors, the rich neighbors and the poorer were alike constrained by one desire, and all were pleased.

For pure and unadulterated success there is nothing like that which emanates from the school and the children. The seventh result is a problem. An unabated continuance is demanded. Here again we are face to face with that truth which has forced itself upon all who are interested in educational kinematography. No matter what great progress has been made hitherto—and it is indeed great—the demands and expectations made by the introduction of the educational exhibitions cannot be met. The moving picture makers have created an appetite and a hunger they are not satisfying. More, more; give us more, is the cry from every quarter. The Moving Picture Educator is being constantly appealed to for advice and help which it cannot give for the purpose of satisfying the right and proper, yet voracious, appetite.

In this particular instance, in which the writer is interested, he is trying to solve these very problems, in the hope that he may through these columns be able to advise the many ministers and school authorities who have been able to go so far and seemingly no further.

EDUCATIONAL PICTURES COMING TO THE FRONT IN THEATERS.

That the educational pictures are gradually coming to take their place with those pictures classed as entirely entertaining, or pleasure giving, is rapidly becoming an established fact. If proof is sought for this, everyone will agree that if in New York City a leading theater can devote one-third of its program to educational pictures, the fact must be established. The advance of the educational picture has of necessity been slow. That this is natural and consistent is acknowledged.

Educationally, the use of these pictures is not immediate; commercially, their profit is more remote; ultimately both their uses and profits are permanent. Time with the consequent growth and accumulation of subjects will find them fulfilling all anticipations and expectations; for educational purposes they will soon be indispensable; for theatrical programs they will also have a permanent place.

There can be little doubt that the Topical and Illustrated News Films proved the entering and opening wedge for all kindred subjects. The following up with other subjects was easy until the public appreciated them, and are now in many places looking for them regularly.

In the theatrical world Mr. Rothapfel of the Strand Theater in New York deserves greatest credit for his persistent use of educational pictures in conjunction with his carefully selected and high class programs. In the most recent exhibition in this theater scenes in Guatemala with a very detailed illustrated description of the "Banana Industry" formed one of the educationals. People seemed pleased to have the culture of this fruit brought before them.

"The Making of a Book" was another film used. Here every stage from the raw material to the finished book was detailed as followed in one of the largest book manufacturers in America. Again public appreciation was manifest. Of course the usual topical series was by no means forgotten.

"Does It Pay?" It is not very long since it was a common cry among exhibitors that the use of educationals adversely affected the receipts. Here is a theater with one of the most cosmopolitan, critical and fastidious audiences possible. The program always pleases, and it is a question if there is a picture house in New York City producing better financial returns. An old excuse is now done away with. It used to be a common excuse for indifferent programs and the exclusion of educationals that "we must give the people what they want." This idea was combatted at the time, contention being made that if the people were given that which they ought to have it would soon result in that same program becoming that which they would demand. Pictures and people have grown together. The people now are fairly well educated in kinematography, even if they do only think it "a motion picture." Neither pictures nor programs of five years ago would suffice today. There is a definite moving picture culture being experienced wherever pictures are habitually shown, and the inclusion of the educational picture is largely responsible. May we predict that from this time on it will be permanent and profitable in the theater.

ROSKAM REPORTS PROGRESS.

Edward M. Roskam, president of the Life Photo-Film Corporation, writes from New Orleans, where he is with Florence Nash and a company of thirty filming "Springtime." that his expectations have been more than met. The weather has been favorable and has been continuously so. The city and county officials of New Orleans, he said, were more than accommodating. Mr. Roskam's camera men were permitted to work in the municipal parks and private reservations. Many of the scenes were acted there to the interest of large crowds.

Mr. Roskam says the company was very successful in the scenes which were taken in the localities described by Booth Tarkington in "Springtime." He did not attempt to film big battle scenes as the main theme of "Springtime" is love, not war. A number of skirmishes run through the play, and these are suggested in the pictures.

A New Kalem Star.

Ruth Roland, One of the Well-Tried Beauties of the Screen, to Be Featured in Future Releases.

KALEM pictures have always been noted for their pretty leading women. It seems to have been the good fortune of the Kalem company to secure pretty girls for its principals and that company has consistently featured its good-looking players whether they could act or not. Kalem now announces that it has a pretty young woman who possesses not only the qualifications of good looks, but who is an equally capable actress. The young woman in question is Ruth Roland, already well known to lovers of Kalem pictures, since she has been appearing in that company's productions for some time and has already established a reputation as a leader in comedy roles.

An Athletic Pose.

Just Ruth.

It is on account of Miss Roland's growing popularity and proved ability to portray human emotions on the screen that the Kalem company has decided to advance her to the position of reigning star of its producing forces.

Miss Roland's beauty is of a virile type and her delightful humor is contagious. 'She makes you laugh in spite of yourself" is an expression frequently heard in audiences where pictures in which she appears are shown. Already she has made for herself a secure place in the hearts of the motion picture fans of this country and has also gained considerable vogue in foreign lands where the Kalem pictures are popular. "Ruth Roland Night" is the signal for a big turn out in every part of England where she has been a prime favorite for some time. On the continent she is everywhere popular with picture theater audiences and South Americans are beginning to demand Kalem comedies in which she appears.

The Kalem comedienne is peculiarly suited to comedy work. Hers is the bubbling nature that finds fun in everything. It is for this reason that even the most amusing scenarios of the plays intended for her, prove even funnier when the result is thrown upon the screen. Miss Roland is constantly doing the unexpected while the picture is being produced, and this adds greatly to the humor of the play. As the photoplay patron remarked, she makes you laugh in spite of yourself.

Miss Roland is essentially a girl of the out-doors. She is an expert equestrienne, a strong swimmer, a crack shot with the rifle and revolver and has repeatedly been victorious in tennis and golf tournaments. These accomplishments serve her in good stead in her work as a motion picture actress. Withal, she possesses a rare girlish charm that has made her immensely popular with all those with whom she has ever come in contact.

Always quick to realize the value of special talent in its players, the Kalem Company proposes to feature Miss Roland prominently in a series of special stories written for her which will be done in two-reel pictures to be released on Monday of each week beginning about the middle of January, 1915, and immediately following the Alice Joyce series. The part Miss Roland will take will be that of a society girl who has become tired of doing nothing and who takes up detective work as a sort of pastime. Each picture will tell a complete story and Miss Ruth may be depended upon to give them a peculiar flavor that is all her own.

All the facilities of the Kalem's Glendale studios will be at the disposal of Miss Roland's company of players, which will be under the direction of James Horn. The initial number of the series will be awaited with considerable interest. There is little doubt that it will be a success, for the ability of Kalem to "pick a winner" is well known.

In keeping with its usual method of popularizing its players, the Kalem Company will prepare an extensive line of special advertising matter for Miss Roland and the series in which she is to appear. The young lady is a particularly good subject for exploitation; she takes good photographs and appears to good advantage in a variety of poses. This material is especially good for lobby displays and it will be materially strengthened by a large full length portrait in oil.

Other literature, interesting to the photoplay fan and calculated to assist the exhibitor in building up his patronage, will be issued in liberal quantities and a variety of forms.

Just what value material of this sort possesses, most exhibitors already know from past experience with Kalem subjects for, if any concern has proved the power of publicity to make its players popular and to create a market for its pictures, the Kalem Co. has done that thing. Exhibitors may confidently expect the best that Kalem can give them in this campaign.

GREEVER OPENS $20,000 PICTORIUM.

H. K. Greever recently opened the Pictorium, a $20,000 moving picture theater at Vernon, Texas. According to reports, the new house is a credit to Vernon, and is so nearly fireproof that the fire insurance rates will not be raised on buildings in the immediate vicinity of the theater. All the electrical wiring has been completed in conduits. In planning and building the Pictorium, stress was laid in providing for all conveniences and comforts for its patrons with a result that the completed structure may be compared with any big picture theater in the larger cities. Admission prices at both matinee and evening shows will be 5 and 10 cents. Among the prominent local persons who spoke in appreciation of the house and the moving picture, at the opening of the Pictorium, was Mayor I. S. Sewell of Vernon. The three picture houses under the management of Mr. Greever, all of which are in Vernon, have a seating capacity of 2,000.

A Good Catch.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Press Work.

SOMETHING in a recent Real Reels leads to the comment that few exhibitors know how to handle press stuff. Now, the real press agent is born and not made. He is a genius in his way, as much as an artist in other lines. Men like E. D. Price come once in every fifteen years, and Barnums and Montgomerys are equally scarce, but any man with sense enough to come in out of the wet can handle press matter if it is given him, if only he gets the idea that he can.

The first great rule is not to sting the editor. To give you a concrete idea of what we mean: This morning we got a press notice of a new book on photoplay writing. We know the writer is fully competent to handle her subject, but we know her publishers are the cheapest kind of cheap people, who get as much as they can and give as little as possible. We did not print the over-adjectived writeup, not because we are afraid of her, but we know her publishers too well not to be from Missouri. Now, the average right-minded editor is the same sort of man. He knows you're all right, but he is not going to take a paragraph with eleven "splendids," nineteen "magnificents," three "gorgeouses," fifty-seven "grands," and a few others. He knows you, but he does not know the film, so he won't take chances. But give him a story that is convincing and reliable looking and he'll be glad to run it. He might run the other sort, but if he does he'll get sore on you in the long run, so don't take chances. Give him stuff that people can read without gasping for breath and you can come back week after week.

But getting that stuff, go to him and ask him to run it. Don't remind him your ad costs eight dollars a week. He knows that better than you do. It may be more blessed to give than to receive, but he likes that little eight per and wishes it was more, and if being kind to you is going to coax it up to ten, he'll do all he can to help you make your mind up to it, so do not speak of the eight, nor yet tell him you are going to raise it to $8.50 soon. Just ask him to run as much of the stuff you give him as he can. Ask him if he'll take a motion picture department if you'll rustle the stuff. Tell him to drop around and see how his readers like the pictures. First thing you know you'll have him going, too.

It only takes a little tact to get into the paper. Use tact and not bluff and bluster.

Ten Thousand Pennies.

Down in Lancaster, Pa., where the ten cent stores come from, the manager of the Family theater announced that he would, on a certain afternoon, throw $100 in pennies from the roof of the theater. The police were so unkind as to stop this squandering of wealth on the ground that some one might be hit, and one of the disgruntled is just unkind enough to hint that he knew they would. Very possibly. But at that it is a better idea than running a farce comedy company and eight reels for five cents. Eight reels and a tabloid comedy is too much for five or ten or fifteen cents. Either the reels are utterly spoiled by being run off too fast or the show is too long. They apparently run a two-hour show. That would just about let the reels in. Supposing that the musical show runs only half an hour and the reels run in an hour and a half, the patrons are being swindled of seventy-five per cent. of what they have paid for, for eight reels in an hour and a half is a butchery and not a performance.

Doing a Raffles.

The Third Street theater, Easton, Pa., is going the "Raffles" stunt. We think that the Easton is doing it on the level, but as they played it in the newspapers, a while back, Raffles never showed up until the last day of the contest. Playing the game on the level is a better idea, and a better one still is to give plenty of passes instead of one big money prize and change the Raffles every day. The Third Street calls their unknown "Alma" and you have to say, "You are Alma, the Third Street theater Girl, I tag you." The value of the scheme lies in the fact that many innocent bystanders are tagged and told about the theater. The bad feature of using a woman is that the ever present masher is too apt to make that the excuse for approaching any woman and talking to her, a fact that has caused the contest to be stopped by the police in one or two places. Better use a man if you try the scheme. It is generally possible to work in conjunction with some paper, and sometimes the local tradesmen are interested by having it mentioned that the Raffles will visit their establishment. Sometimes, too, they are sorry for their interest when the crowd causes them to close their doors and stop trade for a time.

It's a good plan to look at all angles of a scheme like this.

Still Some Room.

The Adele theater, Eatonton, Ga., opened the other day and the occasion was marked by the issuance of a booklet of twelve pages and colored cover. The greeting states that the time has come when Eatonton is deserving of the highest type of house and that is what the Adele is going to be. But the program sounds the keynote rather faintly. The cover, blue on blue, is well done, but the booklet instead of being "saddle stitched" (with wire staples in the crease) is fastened with a single "Hotchkiss" staple in the side. Now, not many may notice that it is a fastener never used by real printers (a wire stapler and 5,000 staples cost only $3), but they do know that it does not look just right and opens awkwardly. It does not carry out the suggestion of the best, and so it defeats the aim of its publisher. Then, too, the program is overcrowded with advertising for a first issue. It would have paid to lay off some of the advertising in order to get more house space for the first issue. Get started right and then build up the advertising, but it should be planned to have the first souvenir issue one that will be preserved, and there is nothing to this booklet to merit preservation. Beyond a well-written first page, the house announcement is a strip of daily program taking less than two inches on a seven-inch page and two "safety first" appeals set in all capitals that few will take the trouble to read.

All Caps.

The use of running matter set in all capital letters is positively vicious. It is a strain on the eye, and unless an announcement is of extreme importance the eye will pass over the capitalized letters. The reason is easily found. In "all caps" there is no variety. All of the letters are of equal heighth, there is nothing to mark the sentences, other than the period, and it looks all alike. In lower case there are letters with ascenders and descenders to break the evenness of the line, and an occasional word like ammunition is saved by the "t" and the dots on "i's" from being a succession of monotony. Although a capitalized word is supposed to give the heaviest possible emphasis, it has not the same effect with a succession of words, but, to the contrary, it makes possible no emphasis whatever. To bring out and make important matter too full to be given good display, either use a full-face lower case, or else put a two-point rule under each line. Either will "throw up" the matter into prominence. All capitals still further bury the announcement. Compare the three examples given:

MATTER SET IN ALL CAPITALS PRESENTS AN UNBROKEN LINE AND THEREFORE IS FATIGUING TO THE EYE WHEN READ AND FORBIDDING TO THE FIRST GLANCE. IT WILL BE READ ONLY WHEN THE CATCHLINE CLEARLY SETS FORTH ITS IMPORTANCE.

On the other hand, matter set in full face suggests the importance of the text without making it unreadable. It can be followed almost as easily as a regular face, but the blackness of the letters causes the matter to stand forth on the page, though it occupies little, if any more space than the light line.

Using the ordinary type face, but underlining with two-point rule, gives the same effect of blackness but leaves the letters themselves easily read. It has the same effect as the underscore mark in written manuscript. The lines should be opened with two-point leads below the rule.

Paste the above on your desk and the next time you want a full announcement to show up strongly, do not mark it "all caps" and defeat your end. It is the commonest mistake of the inexperienced.

And by the same token do not let an important announcement be set in a fussy-looking type. The job may look pretty, but it will not be readable, and your chief aim should be to turn out something that will catch the eye and hold it. A good compositor can show you many similar tricks if you make friends with him, but he won't if you put on an "I-know-it-all" air, nor will the business manager or the advertising solicitor think to tell you. Try and deal with the foreman or, better still, the man who will actually set your job.

Contract Schemes.

Just pin your faith to Sis Hopkins and believe that no one is just pining away to do you a favor without money and without price. Last year we agitated a union of program publishers to get the national advertising. The net result to date seems to have been the abortive efforts of the recent Bert Williams (recent, because he left no forwarding address in the last town) to start something bigger than the idea was worth, and a crop of speculators. These latter offer you free tickets with advertisements on the back, free advertising novelties, or something of that sort. The free ticket people have gone far away from where they were (which was just under our publication offices) but the novelty people are sticking better.

Don't sign up unless you know exactly and precisely what you are signing up for. The contract may seem to be no more than a promise to use whatever may be sent you, but even at that you may get the worst of the bargain and you may find that the contract is so tight that you cannot even use your own house program without being liable to a suit for damages.

Some years ago we went to our then boss and asked for a column of space in the house programs for some press matter, and, strange as the fact may seem, we could not get a single stingy little column in our own program. More than that we had to say that we used the Blank piano where we really used an instrument of an entirely different make, and we could not even get a change in the underline after Tuesday. We got a reasonably good-sized check for the right to print "our" programs, but even in what was supposed to be our own matter we had to use Blank's pianos, Dash's filtered water, Twostars perfume, Dink's celebrated chocolates and Blink's decorations. We could not get a rake-off on Jigg's pianos, just for a program mention, or a drawdown on Boob's chocolates, for the program people had sold those and other rights and we had to take the underlines in what purported to be our own program. At that the program company was not doing one-tenth of what it might have done. And, mind you, we had to stand for that until the end of the contract term, though we had four New York houses and three out of town. We could not even run lines in the program spaces telling of some coming big attraction. When the contract was made assurance was given we would get all the space we wanted. They did not add at contract rates and for all New York programs. Later we printed our own house programs, got all the space we wanted, got the underlines we needed, got a less bulky program, could change when we wanted and still showed a profit above what we were paid before.

Don't tie up to a rainbow. The rainbow may vanish and you may find a concrete hitching post in its stead.

Warn Your Patrons.

Recently F. D. Stanton, of the Orpheum, Gardner, Mass., printed a warning against fake script schools. He did it as a prelude to boosting the school he studied with (yep, he's got the bug), but at that it was a good plan, for he picked the nearest to a real school there is and he warned against the rest.

Lots of your patrons want to write plays. Many of them; perhaps most of them, will fall for the alluring advertisements of the so-called schools. They will be stung and they will be sore on the whole picture business, including your house. Tell them about it. Tell them that most schools are swindles and that the others cannot do any good. Tell them flatly that there is but one way to learn how to write. This is to get one of the good books on Technique and then work hard at practice and study the pictures on your screen. The book may be omitted, but the study of writing and of the screen are imperative. Most schools do not even try to teach and even the best meaning cannot, since teaching photoplay merely means teaching the pupil to think, and that cannot be done, by mail or otherwise. Keep them out of the scrape and in the end they'll be grateful to you. If you want any information write us just what you want and we will gladly supply it.

Don't let people write in of you "the manager of the ——— got me into trouble by telling me it was easy." It isn't.

Another Daily.

And right when Milledgeville was getting back to be the only theater having a daily paper, Burr Swan, of the K. P. Opera House, Pittsfield, Ill., comes along with another daily one-sheet! It is edited by "Ruth," who may be Mrs. Swan; anyhow it is heading in on the right line, but as yet does not run enough local stuff. Get the names of people and what they do and never mind so much the miscellaneous stuff, though the clips show good taste. This is good enough to go into other programs:

THE HORRORS OF WAR.

A soldier of the legion lay dying at Przemysl, he remarked that Sherman told the truth when he said that it was hmysl. "It was in a glorious cause," he said, "in which I fought and fmysl, but what we have been fighting for, God knows I cannot tmysl!"

The Germans and the French have been a-fighting on the Aisne, they fight a week without a rest and then they fight againse. They stop not for the thunder or the lightning or the raisne, but what the fight is all about, will some one please explaisne?—Hillsboro News.

So far the best appeal is made with a column of coming events in which films and local happenings are so intimately mixed that the titles have to be read to get the rest. This will give an idea of how it is worked:

Thursday, November 5—Leslie Wills sale of registered Duroc-Jerseys.

Monday, November 2—D. W. Kaltreider's sale of milk cows at Pittsfield.

Tuesday, November 3—Malcolm Williams in "The Brute," a Famous Players Feature.

Tuesday, November 10—Harry Chapman's public sale of stock near Pleasant Grove school house.

Tuesday, November 10—Wm. Farnum in "The Redemption of David Corson," a Famous Players Feature.

In default of a real daily paper this daily slip fills a real want, and we look to see Mr. Swan printing on both sides and taking advertisements. At present it is all house stuff. The sheet is three columns wide (thirteen ems), and twelve inches long. If you think you can swing one, write Mr. Swan, but go stronger on local mention. After a time they'll bring the items in to you. And never try to "kid" a possible patron. It may get a laugh, or it might lose a family of patrons. Mr. Swan does not do it. This is merely to warn you ahead of time.

If you can afford it, the daily sheet that carries news is the best medium a manager can get. You can even make it pay a profit if you are a live wire, but remember that paying a profit does not mean selling all your space to the butcher and the grocer. Save some—save lots—for yourself.

Another good idea is a card that reads: "I want you to see 'Tess of the Storm Country.'" It is signed by Miss Pickford and Mr. Swan. We'll subscribe to the sheet if Mr. Swan will be so good.

Mr. Wunderle Reappears.

Arthur G. Wunderle, originator of the "Telephonographical" lectures, is on the job again and sends in the program of the Paramount theater, Brooklyn. We are inclined to think his printer is overdoing it a bit. His four-page program is jam-full of type. He has a lot to advertise, but at that he is trying to get too much into four pages. A cut small enough to get into the column will only give an idea, but it will be seen that he is getting a little too much type in a space eleven by eight inches. It staggers the eye. And one of the reasons is that the printer is trying to get too much display type on the page. There is a better balance to this section from the program of the Orpheum, Gardner, Mass. One big line, perhaps an underline and the rest body type. The space here is 5 by 2½. Here the eye picks up the titles, becomes interested and reads the rest, whereas in the Paramount there is so much display it looks like too much to read.

We are glad to see Mr. Wunderle back, for he is a man of ideas, but he should have a serious chat with his printer, explaining to him that the game is not to see how much big type can be gotten on the page, but how good a display.

And before going on, can you make out that lower right hand corner of the Orpheum advertisement? It reads:

His New Profession

He gets a job wheeling a cripple around.
Does the idea strike you as being funny?

It doesn't, but we think the appeal is cleverly done. It tells the entire reel in a line.

Just to be Different.

Just to be different, the Royal theater, Ashland, Wis., prints its program covers in white on a deep maroon, getting a slightly bluish tinge to the white ink. The effect is odd, but we think they could do better by having reversed cuts for the front and back page, so that the cut prints in color all but the letters on white paper. They might not get quite as good a color as paper colored on one side at the mills, but it would be good enough, and they could use any white stock. The front page design is all stock type and ornaments, but it has been done by a compositor with good taste and restraint in ornamentation gives the suggestion of a specially drawn design. The page is not overloaded but suggests quiet elegance. The first program was devoted to the dramatic attractions that opened the house. Later ones are given to the reels. They run an all-film show except on Friday and Saturday, when one act of vaudeville is run with four reels. Five reels are run the other days. The program offers no special feature outside of the cover, but is well done and is not overloaded with type.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Inquest Club Meeting.

SEVERAL new jurymen joined the Inquest Monday, Nov. 16. George Hennessy, Miss Maibelle Heikes Justice, Marc Edmund Jones, Mr. Young, former editor for Crystal, and others sat in with the novices and discussed the Mutual and Universal reels seen at the Savoy.

It was a short bill, for one Mutual gave an entire reel to Empire Day in Nassau, without developing much of interest, and the Mutual Girl offered little that was informative to authors.

Imp's "The Treasure Train" was more instructive in what not to do, and it was agreed that the story was fundamentally wrong in many respects. For the sake of appeal the treasure train was an excursion train carrying one express safe and several hundred children, whereas, it was pointed out, a considerable treasure would have been sent in a regular express car and on some through train. Then, too, the story was told as a narrative, presumably to save a girl telegraph operator her job, but the narrator wasted his time and the time of the president of the road in making the appeal when all the time he was going to marry her and did not really care whether she was let out or not. The big moral was that it takes something more than a hired railroad to make a good railroad story. But the discussion led to the matter of introducing characters so plainly at the beginning of a story that there could be no possible error in latter identifications, and it was agreed that not more than three leading players should be identified in a single scene unless their various personalities were so strongly marked that there could be no possible confusion.

American's "Red Bird Wins" was another story that presented many defects in local color, such as having a horse owner and other habitues sit in the grandstand instead of being close to the rail, doubling up on racing glasses and other bits of color that might have been written in.

Sterling's "A Rural Love Affair," one of the child pictures, taught the lesson that tragedy was but comparative, after all, and that the comedy of a small boy unable to climb out of a small gully was a tragedy to him. It also was pointed out that cruelty to animals is not comedy and that a small boy stepping on a rabbit's neck was not entirely funny.

Those not present at the meeting are requested to note that the club meets on the first and third Mondays, only, and that there is an extra Monday in November. The next meeting will be held on Dec. 7 and the first part of the sitting will be at the Herald Square and not at the Savoy. It may not be possible to arrange for a slide to be used, but the members will come into the lobby at the end of the subject that closes after nine o'clock.

Waited and—

This from a recent letter from Edward W. Matlack:

> As a contrast—Last April I send a story in to take its chances in the Sun-Vita contest. Saturday, to make a long story short, I received notice that the script was bought by VITA and the release has gone back to them. April till the last of October may seem a long time to wait—but, here is where we laugh. It was like getting money from the clouds—it came when I had almost forgotten the script was out.
> And I didn't write any letters asking what had become of the thing, for in July, VITA gave me a card that it was being held. Then I should worry how long they held it.

That is not so much, either. Last week we got a release slip for a story that was sent a company March 14, 1913. In the same batch were stories sent April 13, September 26 and October 19, 1914. Of course, it does not pay to leave a story that long with a company where you are not well known, but it goes to show the value of cultivating the virtues of patience against the time you get there, too.

Costs.

When you go to the stationer for paper for the machine, do you ask for eighty-pound parchment with gold edges, or do you figure that the twenty-pound bond is good enough. Since paper at a dollar and a quarter a box is good enough, of course, you get that. It is what you put on the paper that makes it valuable or worthless, isn't it? Did it ever occur to you that perhaps an editor felt the same way about production and bought the scripts that brought laughs because the business was funny rather than some stuff that might interest because of some costly feature? If you never looked at it in that light, take a good look right now. Suppose you send in a story such as we saw this morning. In the first place, there was a burning barn. That means going out into the country and hiring a barn and filling it with smoke pots and taking more or less of a chance on the hay actually catching fire. In the second place, there were five spots in the barn shown, including the hay loft, where the fire started. That means about three specially painted studio sets and the introduction of a load of hay that must be set on fire. That would be another little underwriters' delight. Then, too, there was a railroad with two trains to be used. This means going down to some station and waiting until two trains—going in the same direction—come in and stop. It must be small town stuff, so that might mean a long wait between trains. And lastly, about eighty per cent. of the action took place at night, which means that about 800 feet of the film would have to be tinted, involving an additional cost. There were about three real laughs in the story, all toward the end.

What chance do you think that story would stand alongside a snappy little comedy with a dozen big laughs and practically no production expense? If you had no interest in either story, wouldn't you think the editor an ass if he took the three laugh story with perhaps $600 extra production expense, instead of the twelve-laugh story that would cost little more than salaries to put on?

Then, why in thunder do you try to bolster up a weak story by a lot of costly mechanical appeal?

It Happens Sometimes.

It does happen now and then that some author, instead of writing the boss that we are an ill-tempered brute, realizes that we have a reason for the tone our stuff sometimes takes, and admits help. One of these is E. Lynn Summers, of Detroit, who has found success for himself and his nephew, the latter a youngster. We hope that this letter will not lead other thirteen-year-old boys to try and sel at once, but there used to be a kiddie over in Brooklyn, only nine years old, who used to try and sell Indian plays with a small boy hero and in his letter always offered to come and play the part free. There is much that will help you in Mr. Summers' letter, please read it.

> A few words of praise for your valuable magazine and especially for the helpful columns conducted by Mr. Sargent.
> I look with eagerness every Monday morning for the arrival of the Moving Picture World. There is an abundance of extremely interesting material throughout its columns, to any one interested in the films, and the photoplay columns, in which I am especially interested, are a veritable encyclopedia of useful suggestions, criticisms, and to the point, facts that are indispensable to the author. Mr. Sargent has a way peculiarly his own, that he encourages the beginner, who shows any aptitude at the game, and an unoffending but terse discouragement to the novice who is absolutely unfitted. To the "kicker" who seems to be in evidence always, his superb open sarcasm ought to win him the respect of the most rabid.
> I believe that I owe my success at the writing game entirely to one of these sarcastic jolts, handed to me by the above-named some eighteen months ago, which "riled me some considerable" when I read it, but after following his suggestion to "sit on a cake of ice until I cooled off." I found the remedy highly beneficial, and began turning out a class of work that has in the eighteen months since that time enabled me to cash checks for sixty-seven stories, out of one hundred and three written, most of the balance being under consideration at this writing. I had never before written photoplays, never written for publication, and had absolutely no experience whatever. Why, I have a little nephew of thirteen, who would put to shame some of the chronic kickers who appear weekly in the photoplay columns, who has succeeded with what instruction I have given him in turning out five stories, every one receiving a check, and the checks were above the average at that. His stories: "The Ragmuffin," "That Boy from the Poor House," "A Daring Getaway," speak for themselves; the other two have not as yet been produced. I could reduce my recipe for saleable photoplays to two words—PLOT and ORIGINALITY: technique might be included, but if you have the other qualifications you'll get by, and close observance to the screen will teach you more about technique than all other methods combined.

Plot and originality are, as Mr. Summers says, the secrets of success, but he neglects to add "hard and constant work" to round out the trio. Plot ability and originality, given intelligent imagination, can be developed only through hard work in practise. On work alone can a lasting success be erected.

Mr. Summers is by no means the only author who has been helped by what, at the time, seems to be insult. Only lately we announced that the man who was going to take our advice to curl up and die had uncurled himself and was working again with greater hope than ever.

For something like twenty-two years we have been a critical writer of one sort and another, running from Grand Opera on Broadway to the Honkatonks of the wild west, and long ago we found that the only way to puncture the compacency of self-conceit was to hit hard enough at times to penetrate a Harveyized cuticle. We would just as soon write with a crow quill pen as with a sledge hammer, but sometimes a hammer is needed. When we send a two-cent stamp back to an inquirer with the request that he stick a self-addressed return envelope to it, we do not mean to be nasty, but that seems to be the time to give him a lesson in business practice that may save him a sale or a script later on. Merely telling him will do no good, water on a duck's back sticks like glue alongside good advice, but when he has to do what he should have known how to do, then he remembers, even if he does write the boss that the Devil probably would not let us contribute to the Gehenna Daily News, as even the damned had some rights.

Get as angry as you like at what we write, but get angry enough and it will do you some good—if it is possible to do you service at all.

Do a Little Thinking.

Lately we told of a writer who wanted to know how many words there were in a newspaper headline, when he had only to pick up a newspaper and count the letters in the heading he fancied. Comes another to know what companies are releasing split-reels; a fact readily ascertainable by turning to the calendar of releases. We don't mind telling an aspiring author that a twelve o'clock train leaves at twelve o'clock, but it will not help him any. He needs to learn to think for himself, and such questions indicate that he is not using his brain properly.

Observation—keen, careful, analytic observation—is one of the requirements of play writing, and should be assiduously cultivated. It is observation that teaches you how men and women act and that knowledge, in turn, enables you to write convincingly and therefore acceptably. You might not have a trolley motorman pulling the throttle to stop his car, but we did see a story once where an engineer, bound and gagged in his cab, raised an alarm by ringing the bell with his foot. It listened fine, but the author did not know that the bell rope is up in the roof of the cab on the left, or fireman's side, and that to reach it the engineer would have to hop down from his side, cross over, hop up to the fireman's seat and then stand on his head. That performance rather hurt the chances of production, for apparently the whole story was written around this scene, and yet the writer did not take the trouble to look an engine over to see how it was built.

Be a Warner.

When a friend or acquaintance tells you they are going to write, don't urge them to get a book of instructions and start in. Tell them of the breakers ahead and then it is up to them to accept the warning or not, as they elect.

Too many women are starting to write plays with no other reason than that they are widowed and the insurance money is all gone. That is no reason at all. Too many men and women start in to write just because it seems so easy and as many others take up the work because they took first prize in composition in school. Nine-tenths of the time we used to get demerits because we dodged writing compositions and the rest of the time demerits because what we did write was either bad or cribbed from the encyclopedia. It's no sign at all.

If you have a proper respect for your craft, you'll try and keep out the incompetents.

Did You Get One?

Will some reader please tell us of the company that "criticizes" scripts for $1.25 by means of a printed sheet. That seems to be something new.

The Dumps.

Do you ever get the dumps? Just been cheering up a lady who is far down in the dumps, so far down that she doesn't think she ever will be a writer, for she has nothing to show for six months' work and a woman she knows has found a great success. There are bound to come periods of discouragement when the game seems not even worth the wick, let alone the candle, and the only thing to do then is to fight it off and feel that you must conquer. Six months is far too short a time in which to find success, and six years may be too short a period, but the success that is founded on six years of earnest endeavor is apt to be far more lasting than the more easily won triumph, so take heart of grace in that fact and keep right on plugging. It's tough to work and work and work and pay rental on a typewriter and get inflamed eyes and all to no seeming purpose, and yet every script you write is bringing you closer to the goal, and if you are so slow of thought that you seem to make no progress, remember that the slow student is the most lasting one. A two-inch wire nail gets a better grip than a quarter-inch tack. Stick and forge ahead, and when you feel that life is not worth living realize that it is just the dumps and give a merry laugh—if you can. If you can't you can at least force a smile, even if it hurts your face at the moment.

And remember, too, that the big writer often has the dumps, too. It maybe that he sold only three instead of twelve scripts the previous month, but that seems just as bad—to him—so softly murmur, "There are others," and turn to the treadmill again.

Getting Plots.

You don't know how close you are to plots all the time. The other day we got a letter from John William Kellette. That reminded us that he had just sold a story with a Chinaman in it, it reminded us we had not used a Chinaman lately, so we wrote a story with Chinamen in it. Simple way to do it! Titles may suggest stories utterly unlike those they caption, a plot may suggest something quite different, a cartoon may give a hint that is not a bit like the cartoon and lately a passing funeral suggested a farce that had no hint of death or funerals in it—and writing about it has just suggested another plot -also without an undertaker.

Train yourself to look for a plot in anything and everything and in the course of time you'll get to the point where the plots come without even having been called. Then buy a loose leaf note book, vest pocket size, and learn to make a one or two-line note that will suggest a whole story to you a month from now.

Backs Up Miss Brown.

E. E. Sypher champions the cause of Miss Alice Brown in the matter of short handing plays for subsequent study, declaring that, contrary to the opinion of the other side, the concentration necessary helps rather than hinders a study of the effect. It may help other short hand writers to note that a slanting dash indicates the break between scenes and a V check encloses the leaders. He uses a pocket flash, but as a rule there is some exit light that will supply enough illumination. He adds:

> After I had secured my twenty-six scripts in this way, I set out to study them, not in the best way, perhaps, but in the only way that suggested itself to me. I went over all of them first, writing some notes about each one, stating where I thought the central idea came from. Then I went over them again, and made notes stating the things that touched, interested, repelled, or irritated me. (I might say at this point that in making these latter notes I proved to my own satisfaction that crime and violence do not constitute "punch.") Then I went over the scripts a third time, and collected data on how the story was told in action; that is, what kind of scene was used to introduce it, what followed, and so on. Then I bought a copy of "Technique," and studied how to put a play on paper.

To each man his method, and Mr. Sypher makes out a good case, but after all the argument there still remains this one important fact: It is not the method that has helped another but the method that helps you that is really important to you. There is one best line of study for your modes of thought. Find that method and stick to it. Whatever gives you the clearest and most exact conception of the plot is what is best for you, for in the last analysis it all comes down to plotting.

Spare the Details.

If you make a sale, don't go and spoil the editor. Don't send him the home paper with your poem in. That doesn't interest him. He wants good plays, not past performances. Don't send a postcard picture and write on the back, "I think a scene like this would be lovely for scene thirty-eight of my play, don't you?" That may interest the postmaster in your home town if he gets a chance to read it, but the editor will only say something cross. Do not send him a clipping showing that you are now the president of something or other. That won't impress him. He would rather have another good story, but he'll be afraid to buy from you if you bother him. Take your check, say "thanks" and shut up. Then there may come another check. But if you send in a script and "do so hope" he'll take it because little Willie has the mumps and you need money for medicine, he'll remember you the next time. Take the time-honored advice and tell your troubles to the policeman, but leave the editors alone. Just the other day it cost a lady seventy cold, hard dollars to send an editor photographs of herself, her home, her writing desk and her two small boys and asked him to return them promptly. He returned them, but he also returned a two-reeler he might have accepted, being fearful that after a double sale she might send along the marriage certificate and her husband's commission as Notary Public for him to look at and return.

Editors make a lot of friends through their work, but leave it to them to make the overtures.

Think Time.

Set apart a period each day for thinking. If you are a man pick a time when you can smoke and just think. If you don't smoke then just get to some quiet place and think. If you can't get a quiet place, think in the street car on the way home or on your way to work in the morning, or when you are performing some purely mechanical task, but set apart some time each day for thinking about plots and you'll find that the longer and harder you think the easier thinking will become.

An Old Home Week.

Having an old home week for scripts is something new, but one methodical author explains that twice a year he takes his morgue and goes over it thoroughly. He reads every rejected script, every memorandum of a story, anything and everything, in fact, that lies in the grave of buried hopes. Sometimes he gets an idea for fixing over a cripple, sometimes he gets a brand new idea from a cripple and now and then he discovers that parts of two poor stories will combine to make one good one. Always he is cheered by the thought that he is doing better work than he did on those earlier scripts. Sometimes the story you simply cannot write to-day is the very story that will almost write itself to-morrow. Go sit with your own dead and see if you cannot do a good job of resurrecting.

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT is an established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until the excellence of such articles have been demonstrated to its editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two or three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending four cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay. Special replies by mail on matters which cannot be replied to in the department one dollar.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready, and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you cannot answer without a lot of study. Canadians should send P. O. M. O., or coin only.

Question No. 61.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Theater managers looking for high-class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Name the various fuses necessary in a theater, and explain how you would determine the necessary capacity of each set. What difference is there in a fuse designed to be used on 110 volts and 500 volts? Or 110 or 220 volts? How would you make an efficient fuse tester, and where would you locate it? A fuse on an important circuit blows; seconds count; "feeling for the current" with the fingers is unreliable and dangerous, since, if the wires should happen to be crossed with high tension, it might kill or, at least seriously injure you. What would be the common-sense thing to do in such a case as this? How would you, if prepared, test so as to instantly tell, with absolute certainty, which fuse is blown? What is the best tool with which to take out and insert cartridge fuses quickly?

Roll of Honor.

Question No. 55 brought out a considerable number of fairly correct replies. Unfortunately there was a mis-print in the question. Owners of the question booklet had the thing right. The motor was supposed to be a 6 h.p., instead of a 66, as printed in the department. However, this would not affect the correctness of a reply in which 66 was used, since it would in no way alter the process of arriving at the result. There were a number of answers which were correct all the way through, though the method of figuring was somewhat different in different cases. Montreal, it seems to me, has a shade the best of it, since his reply is concise, and takes into consideration the 25 per cent. addition to the underwriter's table, which no other correspondent mentions.

The Roll of Honor consists of Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; John Solar, Watertown, N. Y.; T. H. Williams, Buxton, Iowa; M. W. Larmour, Waco, Texas; J. I. Roberts, Nashville, Tennessee; William J. Crane, Nashville, Tennessee; Byron Stokes, Weatherford, Texas; H. W. Seward, Reading, Pennsylvania, and W. J. Neff, Reno, Nevada.

Some of those included in the Roll of Honor this week had slight errors in their wire calculations, not sufficient, however, to keep them off the Roll of Honor, but I would suggest that they look at Montreal's reply very carefully.

Montreal took his motor power from the booklet which, as above stated, gives it as 6 horse-power.

Answer to Question No. 55.

By Montreal, Canada.

The Question:

A 16 c.p. carbon incandescent lamp requires 55 watts. Give the following data: (1) C.p. per watt. (2) Watts per c.p. (3) Number of lamps per k.w. (4) Number of lamps per h.p. Suppose you were installing a 6 hp. motor in your theater, the same to pull a dynamo for lighting. The voltage is 110 and the efficiency of the motor 66 per cent. What size wire is necessary to supply the motor when working at capacity, the circuit being only ten feet in length? Give the rule by which this is found.

The Answer:

The method of finding the data on a 55 watt, 16 c.p. incandescent lamp is as follows:

(1) C.p. per watt, 16 c.p. = 55 watts, 1 c.p. = 16 ÷ 55 = .29, hence .29 c.p. per watt.

(2) Watts per c.p., 55 watts = 16 c.p., 1 watt = 55 ÷ 16 = 3.4 approx, hence, 3.4 watts per c.p.

(3) Number of lamps per k.w., 55 watts = 1 lamp, 1,000 watts = 1,000 ÷ 55 = 18.18, or say 18 lamps.

(4) Number of lamps per h.p., 55 watts = 1 lamp, 746 watts = 1 h.p., hence, 746 ÷ 55 = 13.56, or say 13½ lamps per h.p.

Rule for finding necessary size of wire to supply current for a motor is as follows: Multiply the h.p. of the motor by 746 (watts per h.p.), then multiply this by the length of the circuit from fuse block to motor, again multiply by twice the mil foot standard of resistance. Now multiply the voltage of the motor by the desired per cent., drop in voltage at the motor and multiply this by the efficiency of the motor, expressed as a decimal, and divide the first result by the second.

To make this more plain I will put is in the shape of a formula, and give the names to the figures.

$$\text{Circular mills} = \frac{\text{H. P.} \times 746 \times \text{D} \times 21.6}{\text{E} \times \text{L} \times \text{K}}$$ in which H.P. = horse power of motor; 746 = watts per h.p.; D = length of circuit; 21.6 = ohms per foot, where wires are one mil in diameter; E = voltage of motor; L = drop in per cent. of the voltage at the motor; K = efficiency of the motor expressed as a decimal.

The average value of K is about 1 h.p. = 75 per cent.; 3 h.p. = 80 per cent.; 5 h.p. = 80 per cent.; 10 h.p. and over, 90 per cent.

Now in figuring the question:

$$\text{Circular mills} = \frac{6 \times 746 \times 10 \times 21.6}{110 \times 2 \times .8} = 49{,}936$$

I am allowing the efficiency to be expressed as the decimal .8, and am allowing 2 per cent. drop in the voltage. We now look at a wire table giving the carrying capacity of copper wire, and see that the nearest larger wire has a c.m. area of 52,630, which corresponds to a No. 3 wire, B&S gauge. But one point we must not lose sight of, viz.: the wire must be compared with that allowed by the underwriters for full load current of motors, plus 25 per cent. of that current, and if the size obtained by calculation is smaller than the size allowed, it should be increased to the next larger, or it may not pass inspection. To find the current for a motor, in our case of a 6 h.p., multiply the h.p. by 746, and divide the product by the voltage multiplied by its efficiency, or $(6 \times 746) \div (110 \times .8) = 51$ amperes, nearly, which must be increased by 25 per cent. of itself $(51 \times .25) = 12.75$ amperes, $51 + 12.75 = 63.75$ amperes. By our table we find that 76 amperes is the safe carrying capacity of No. 3 B. & S. gauge, rubber covered wire, so that it would be ample in size for the purpose.

Legal Absurdities.

From the president of a Moving Picture Machine Operators' Local in a certain New York State city comes a letter making certain rather acrimonious comments on the State License Law matter, as set forth in the department recently, accompanied by the following which the writer of the letter says is a copy of the local law they expect and hope to get passed in that city. The proposed law, which the writer claims is a copy of the law to be submitted to their local authorities for adoption, reads as follows:

1. An applicant for a moving picture operator's license shall make application therefore under oath, on a blank which may be obtained from the city clerk, and shall furnish two (2) miniature photographs of himself (1¾ inches square). One of these photos to be placed on the application when it is filed; the other on the license when it is issued, photo to be partly covered by seal.

2. Each applicant shall be examined by a board consisting of three (3) examiners, at least one of whom shall be a practical moving picture operator who is actually working at the time.

3. An applicant must be at least twenty-one (21) years of age.

4. An applicant now working, who has worked one year or more at the trade, and is eighteen (18) years of age or over is eligible.

5. An applicant must have operated a moving picture apparatus at least six (6) months prior to the date of application.

6. On and after the first day of.....an applicant must have served as an apprentice, under a licensed operator, for a period of not less than six (6) months, prior to the date of application, and the application must be accompanied by the affadavit of the licensed operator to that effect. This clause shall not apply to an applicant who has been previously granted a license.

7. Before entering upon the period of apprenticeship under a licensed operator, such apprentice must register with the examining board, a statement giving name, age, address, and place of employment as such apprentice.

8. The examining board must immediately report to the Mayor the result of each examination, and if the applicant is found competent a license will be issued to him within six (6) days after such examination.

9. Each license or renewal shall be countersigned by the city clerk, who shall keep a record of all licenses or renewals.

10. A fee of three ($3) dollars must be paid to the city treasurer for each license, and one ($1) dollar for each renewal.

11. License shall continue in force one (1) year from date of issue.

12. A license at one (1) year from date of issue, unless it has been revoked or suspended, will be renewed without further examination, providing that application for such renewal is made within thirty (30) days from date of expiration.

13. Members of the examining board shall have authority to inspect operating rooms and apparatus, as well as operators, within their jurisdiction, and shall report to the proper authority any violation or defects.

14. This law shall apply to every person who operates a moving picture apparatus and its connections, within the City of....., County of....., State of New York.

15. It shall be a misdemeanor for any person to operate or permit any person to operate a moving picture apparatus and its connections without a license, and shall be punishable by a fine of not less than twenty-five ($25) dollars, or more than one hundred ($100) dollars, or three (3) months imprisonment, or both.

16. Any license issued hereunder may be revoked or suspended by the examining board, at any time, for any of the following causes:

(A) For making false statements in the application for license.

(B) For failure to display the license in a conspicuous place in the room where the moving picture apparatus is being operated.

(C) For lending license to any person.

(D) For smoking, or permitting smoking in the operating room at any time.

(E) For permitting any fire or open lights in the operating room, while the audience is in the building.

(F) For failing to test apparatus and connections prior to starting the show.

(G) For permitting any unlicensed person, other than the manager or authorized city official, to be in the operating room, while the audience is in the building.

(H) For having more than one (1) reel of film exposed, in the operating room, other than the reels which are in the machines.

(I) For such other acts or omissions which, in the opinion of the examining board, would show that the operator is incompetent or careless.

I have printed this legal attempt as a warning and an example to others. I have before spoken of the difficulty of drawing up an adequate law, and yet here is matter to be submitted to the city authorities for adoption which is evidently the result of the efforts of men who know absolutely nothing whatever about the drafting of laws, or the requirements of such a draft.

In the first place, the wording is extremely crude, and in many places the meaning is ambiguous, and at one point directly contradictory. Clause 2 of the proposed law simply says: "Each applicant shall be examined by a board consisting of three examiners, at least one of whom shall be a practical moving picture machine operator who is actually working at the trade." But it does not say a word about how this board is to be formed, who is to do the appointing, what the salary of its members shall be, how often it shall hold sittings, nor does it make any provision for competency in the examining board. It says there shall be one operator, but erects no safe-guard as regards the competency of this operator member to make an adequate examination, and the mere fact that a man is a moving picture operator is absolutely no sign that he is competent to hold an examination of the kind proposed. As to the other two members of the board, why, as the proposed law now reads, a brick-layer might sit, accompanied by a plumber, or a ward heeler might be placed in the position if it carried salary with it. Such a clause as this is worse than foolish. It is the most bungling kind of a bungling attempt to do something without adequate knowledge of how to do it.

Clause 3 directly contradicts clause 4. Clause 3 says that an applicant must be twenty-one years of age, without any ifs and ands about it. It is complete within itself. Then clause 4 turns around and kicks a dent in the side of clause 3 without any apparent reason. In order to get at what was intended, clause 3 should read something like this: "An applicant for moving picture machine operator's license must be not less than twenty-one years of age, provided, however, that where license is applied for within thirty days from the final passage of this law by one who has worked as a moving picture machine operator for not less than one year, the minimum of twenty-one years may be reduced to eighteen."

Clause 5 should read: "Every application for moving picture machine operator's license must produce evidence satisfactory to the examining board that he has operated moving picture projectors and apparatus for a period of not less than six months prior to the date of his application." But even if it read that way it would be contradicted by clause 6, since you could not say that an apprentice has "operated" moving picture machines and apparatus in the true sense of the word.

Clause 7 contains no provision for registering change. Supposing a man commenced to serve an apprenticeship and the house went out of business after he had served five months. Strictly speaking, as the clause now reads, if he started in another house he would have to register as beginning there, and serve the full six months in that house.

Why should the examining board "report" to the mayor? It seems to me as if the board itself should be the license issuing authority, although there is no particular objection to ringing the mayor in on the deal if it is so desired.

Referring to clause 12, why should application for renewal be made thirty days before expiration?

Clause 13 causes a wide smile. "Members of the examining board shall have authority to inspect operating rooms and apparatus, as well as operators." Huh! Well, I might let the Board of Health inspect me, if necessary, but I am darned if an examining board could do it without demonstrating their ability to perform the act by physical force.

Again, why should this board report violations or defects? Why not take away the license of the operator for allowing them, or suspend the license of the theater, if necessary? But what constitutes a "defect" in an operator?

Clause 14 should be combined with clause 15; in fact, clause 14 is superfluous, since clause 15 takes care of the matter.

Under clause 16, why should a license be displayed conspicuously in the operating room? In fact, why should it be displayed at all? The most convenient and sensible form of license is a card, suitable to be carried in the pocket. That works well here in New York, where there are a thousand operators working, and certainly it would work out at least equally as well in a smaller city.

Section D is very largely piffle, because out in San Francisco smoking is allowed in the operating room and you don't hear of any fires in that city. However, there are no objections to the clause, and it is rather advisable where comparatively young men are employed as operators.

Section F is pure unadulterated piffle. In the first place, "testing the apparatus" might mean most anything, and if a man's license is to be taken away if he does not test, then the law must say what kind of a test is required.

And so I could go on and point out other inconsistencies in this proposed law. In fact, the whole thing, from a legal standpoint, is meaningless, for if it were taken into court the court could construe these various things to mean almost anything.

I have before pointed out the fact that the drafting of an adequate license law is not a task to be lightly undertaken. It is an exceedingly difficult thing to do and do right. I, myself, would not think of undertaking the job without the aid of a competent attorney, and also, if I could secure it, the aid of some one who had been a member of the Legislature for several years. There is no earthly use in presenting a law, or getting a law passed that has so many legal loop holes in it that nobody is going to respect it or pay any attention to it. On the other hand, if you get a license law properly and carefully drafted and passed you are in a mighty good position, because you are in shape to compel the enforcement of that law.

I have the most friendly feeling for the men in the city this effort emanates from, and I sincerely trust they will not be angry because I have used their legal effort to show others what mistakes men can make when they try to draft a law without adequate knowledge of that kind of proposition. By the way, why keep a man waiting six days for his card after he has passed? Why not compel the issuance of license within twenty-four hours. Six days leeway is nonsense.

Grounds.

W. H. Muller, Jamaica, L. I., New York, wants to know:

(a) Will a ground on the lower carbon jaw of the lamp blow a fuse when striking the arc? (b) If not, what would happen? (c) Will ground in rheostat connected on negative side and located on conductor blow a fuse when lighting the lamp? If not, what would happen?

(a) If it was a two-wire system, insulated, and the ground was heavy enough it would blow the fuse. If it was a three-wire Edison system with a grounded neutral, and the neutral was attached to lower jaw, nothing at all would happen. (b) Answered above. (c) What would happen under these conditions would depend somewhat upon the "ground." If one of the coils were grounded to the frame of the rheostat, and the frame itself was insulated from the ground, nothing at all would happen, except that when you touch the rheostat you would probably get a shock. If it was an Edison three-wire system and the rheostat was on the neutral, the fact that the rheostat was or was not insulated from the ground would not make any difference. If, on the other hand, it was a rheostat containing two rows of coils and a coil on one side sagged against the coil on the other side in such manner as to cut out a portion of the resistance, then that would be in the nature of a short circuit, and probably your fuse would blow. There are so many different angles to this grounding business that it is rather a difficult matter to explain it briefly. I think, on the whole, I will prepare an article on grounds and publish it in the near future. It seems to be a puzzling question to a great many operators, some of whom are pretty good ones too.

River of Doubt.

R. W. Martin, Bellevue, Pennsylvania, asks:

(1) What is the main defect, if any, in the star and cam movement? (2) What are the real advantages of the Power's Six intermittent movement? (3) To what extent does the speed of the cut-off action of the revolving shutter influence flicker? I have seen patents of special shutters for increasing the speed of the cut-off, and have heard of lens arrangements for making the light spot upon the shutter very small, and much more evidence of the importance of this factor; yet I do not find any mention of it in the Handbook. (4) Why is there so much river of doubt and forbidden fruit?

Well, Brother Martin, if I attempted to answer questions 1 and 2 in the department there would be a hornet's nest around my ears in a hurry, and, moreover, there is much honest difference of opinion among very able men concerning the relative merits and defects of various types of intermittents and movements. For these reasons I would prefer not to discuss queries one and two in print, because, in any event, I could only express my own individual views, and might have a hard time backing those views up with actual proof. As to your question No. 3, if I understand you right you mean the length of time it takes the revolving shutter to cover the lens aperture. Why, yes, that is of considerable importance, because the picture cannot start to move until at least three-fourths of the aperture is covered. Now, with the inside shutter this was a more important matter than with the outside shutter, provided the latter be placed so that it cuts the beam at its narrowest point. The inside shutter has to travel about three-fourths of the diagonal of the aperture before the film starts to move, then, in uncovering the aperture, travel three-fourths of the diagonal of the opening after the film has stopped, so that you will very readily see that the shutter is cutting light equal to a shutter blade width of 1½ times the diagonal of a ¾ by 15/16 opening while the film is at rest. This represents, to a certain extent, waste, and if the cut-off could be accomplished more quickly you could utilize a portion of that light on the screen. To make the matter more clear—if, for instance, the light could be shut off instantly, just as the film begins to move, and the aperture opened instantly when it stops, you would utilize just that much more light, and, with a given intermittent speed, would have the picture on the screen just that much longer. I did not mention this directly in the Handbook, but indirectly I did, or at least the matter is covered where the effect of the shutter is described. As to question 4, I was somewhat amused. I know what you mean, Friend Martin, and you will find that the river of doubt and forbidden fruit is present almost everywhere where there are rival types of things for sale. If you want to get an experience in the "River of Doubt and forbidden fruit" line, just try your hand in the motorcycle game. The publications in that field are something worse than a joke, when it comes to giving their readers any real information. They seem to be owned lock, stock and barrel by the advertisers, a condition which is not true in the motion picture field, praise be. Still, where expert machinists have honest differences of opinion, as in this geneva matter, we cannot take too arbitrary a stand. There are things to be said on both sides of the geneva argument, therefore, it would not be right for this department to set itself up as a final judge. Nor do we even feel like expressing an opinion when the opinion would only be our own personal preference.

Sure I Can.

The manager of a moving picture operating school, Buffalo, N. Y., asks:

> Will you kindly advise as to what constitutes a fair examination for a moving picture operator? We are thinking of having a board in this city. Any information you will give will be highly appreciated.

Who this manager means by "we" I am unable to say. Presumably, however, he means that the Buffalo authorities are expecting to inaugurate an examination for moving picture operators in the near future, a thing I heartily approve of. Just why this particular information is wanted I do not know, but probably it is to get a line on what to teach in the "school." All right, here is what the editor considers would constitute a fair examination.

(a) An examination as to the knowledge the applicant possesses of electrical action and the fundamental laws and rules which apply thereto. (b) His knowledge of grounds, their effect, and locating the same. (c) His knowledge of the three wire system, both the Edison and insulated. (d) His knowledge of optical principles as applied to the projection lens system and the shutter. (e) His knowledge of wire capacities, sizes and insulation. (f) His knowledge of aberration, both spherical and chromatic; its cause; its effects and its remedy. (g) His knowledge of city regulations as applied to the moving picture operating room. (h) His knowledge of what to do in case of fire. (i) His knowledge of such other things electrical, optical, and mechanical as he is likely to come into contact with in the business of projecting pictures.

I hope, however, that if the city of Buffalo does pass an ordinance requiring an examination of operators that it will also provide that before receiving a license the man must either prove to the board that he has operated for a period of one year, or has served an apprenticeship under a licensed operator in the city of Buffalo for not less than six months. If this is done, the "students" will have such training as the school gives them, plus six month's actual apprenticeship, instead of being placed in charge of a projection machine and left to acquire their practical experience at the expense of the public.

Some Questions.

Tampa, Florida, orders a set of the questions and writes:

> Our equipment consists of two Model B inside shutter Edisons, five years old, and mercury arc rectifier taking 220 volt 60 cycle current. The rectifier is connected to the machines with No. 6 wires. We use two 7½ condensers, 5¾ lenses, the distance from the film to the screen being 70 feet, and the width of the picture being 11 feet 3 inches. I am sending herewith sketch of the shutter now being used. It is an inside shutter drawn actual size. What I would like to know is, is the shutter correct in every way? If it is not, I would like to have instructions how to make one that is. Am being bothered by considerable flicker from both machines, and the picture has a blue spot which comes in different shapes from both machines. I have my lamp house as far back as it will go. If the current is 220 volts, and during the day it falls to 190 or 180, does it have any considerable effect on the picture? The shutter has lost motion. If this is eliminated will it take off some of the flicker? Suppose you were sent to a country town to give a show in some dance hall, and the wires entering the hall were No. 14, what would you do? And, suppose it was a 220-volt current and you had only a 110-volt rhoestat along, what would you do? Suppose we were pulling 50 amperes from a 110-volt line through a rheostat, arc voltage 50, what is the resistance in ohms of the rheostat? Is that all the resistance the current encounters? Will you kindly give me the address of James Chambless and information regarding his catalogue.

Your first questions are all right, but the last, my brother, sound as if you are coaching for an examination. As to the shutter, the design is such that, without measuring, I should think fully 80 per cent. of the light would be cut, and that is bad—very bad. I believe you could probably improve matters, or at least not make them any worse, by cutting at least ⅛ inch off each side of the two small blades, anyhow I would make a pasteboard shutter that way and try it. As to the lost motion, why lost motion would produce travel ghost, but would have no effect on flicker. I could not send you a pattern of a correctly-proportioned shutter, because its proportions would depend altogether on the speed of your intermittent movement. As to your other questions, I would suggest that the practical thing for you to do would be to forward $2.50 for a copy of the Handbook. All those questions are answered therein. I cannot take up valuable space in the department answering them here, as they are quite elementary, and, moreover, I do not care to answer a series of questions that look very much like examination questions which you have fallen down on. In the Handbook you will find the answers, but you will have to dig them out, and, having done that, you will understand the true meaning, and not simply learn the answer by heart, which is what I want to do—give you real knowledge, not merely teach you a set of answers by rote. The address of James Chambless is 703 Cherry street, Evansville, Ind., and you can write him direct for the information you wish.

Upstill Corrected.

Vernon F. Alley, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, corrects Brother Upstill's reply to Question 37 as follows:

> In looking over some back numbers I noticed an error in the answer of Eugene A. Upstill, Long Pine, Nebraska, to Question 37, August 1st issue. The mistake in question relates to the following: "You cannot use a two-phase motor on a single-phase supply." In your comment you say that his answer is correct as far as it goes, but, if any one wished to elaborate you would be glad to hear from them, which is my excuse for writing. Mr. Upstill evidently is not familiar with alternating current phenomena, and knows very little about the action of induction motors. The reason I say this, is that there are many split-phase motors on the market, which act on the principle of enclosed diagram. They are usually of the clutch type, > that is, the rotor starts to revolve on the shaft and when it reaches a certain speed a centrifugal clutch expands and engages a disc on the shaft, whereupon the motor picks up its load. This split-phase winding is only in circuit while the motor is attaining its speed, when the switch I have shown at S is opened by centrifugal force and the motor operates single phase. As I have explained on another sheet, any two-phase induction motor may be connected to a single-phase system and will operate fairly well, the main objection being that the motor must attain its full speed before engaging its load, as it has a very slight starting torque, unless the primary current at starting is fully four or five times the full load requirement, under which condition the full load running torque will be developed at starting. But this is impractical for obvious reasons. If you have read this far I thank you for your patience, because I know you are a busy man, but before I close I wish to extend an invitation to visit the Imperial Theater on your next trip to Philadelphia. I believe the projection will meet your approval, because, I, too, am a crank on that subject.

It runs in my mind that this error was corrected before, but, nevertheless, Brother Alley's explanation is very clear and makes interesting reading. I am not so very well acquainted with the action of induction motors myself, though I am learning fast. I shall be very glad, indeed, to visit the Imperial when next I go to Philly, because I like to meet cranks on projection; I meet altogether too many of the other kind. Every letter to this department is read very carefully, my brother, for even though four-fifths of it may be of no value, one sentence may justify, and more than justify the time expended.

Automatic Rewinding.

F. E. Fredericks, Port Clinton, Ohio, is the inventor of the Fredericks auto-rewinder. Mr. Fredericks has demonstrated one of these machines to the editor of this department, who examined the same with a great deal of interest—a great deal of interest, indeed. To say that it is a clever device does not express it. The idea is both unique and ingenious, and, while I would not care to express an authoritative opinion on the machine at this time, more than to say, that it unquestionably works, and will, so far as I am able to see, have no tendency to injure the film, but rather to largely lessen the damage done to it. I believe there is a field for it, and that Mr. Fredericks is likely to reap reward for his inventive labor on this apparatus, always assuming it works as well in the hands of the operator as it did in the demonstration. And I see no reason why it should not do so.

FIG. 1.

Figure 1 shows the rear, or motor, side of the machine. It will be observed that the motor pulley bears on a disc wheel, which enables the operator to change the speed of the projector at will. It will also be seen that the steel casing, which is made of heavy sheet metal, has a stovepipe hole just above and to the left of the friction wheel. Now, looking at Figure 2, which shows the front side of the machine, we see that when the door is closed the whole thing becomes, in effect, a stove, and with the vent hole in Fig. 1 connected to the open air by suitable metal pipe the smoke and gas from burning films would be carried outdoors, and the operator could remain right there with the machine while whole reels burned.

It is difficult to describe the operation of this apparatus intelligently. However, looking at Fig. 2, we see, at the left, a small magazine with an ordinary reel therein, and inside the machine two huge reels capable of containing 3,500 feet of film. Running up from the right hand side to the projector is a sort of metal spout, which looks like a carpenter's square. At 1 and 2 are rollers. Now, in the first place, the reel of film, as received from the exchange, is placed on the small magazine, its end passed through the fire trap and fed across and up through the aforesaid spout and down through the projector and onto the upper reel. But right at this point I am stuck, for I do not remember now just how the rest of the threading is accomplished, but anyway, three reels will feed into the machine, each being joined to the other, and then the tail-end of the last film is joined to the title of the first one, thus forming an endless belt, and from then on, all day long, the film requires no further attention, unless there is a break, in which case the trouble is, Mr. Fredericks tells me, readily remedied without stopping the projection of the picture.

Figure 1 shows the top reel full and the lower reel empty. Now, looking at the lower reel, take note of roller 4, which is carried by an arm and rests on the film roll; just below roller 3 you will see the end of what looks like a hollow tube, 3, which is in reality a clutch which holds the film to the hub of the wheel, the aforesaid hub being, at a guess, 5 inches in diameter. Now, when roller 4 gets down so that it touches the hub, or, in other words, when the film is all fed off the lower reel, it releases a mechanism which causes the whole carriage, carrying both the upper and lower reels, to revolve one-half of a revolution, at the same time releasing clutch 3 in the lower reel. By this operation the relative position of the two reels is changed, the empty reel occupying the position the full reel did occupy. The direction of rotation of the reels is also changed, clutch 3 re-arranges the film at a new point and begins to rewind it on the empty reel, the full reel meanwhile starting to feed out film to the mechanism. All this is done without in the least interfering with the projector, which keeps right on shooting a picture at the screen. The reels are not pulled by the mechanism, but are driven by the motor. There is little or no pull on the film at any point.

Figure 3 shows the reels in process of changing position; the empty one going up and the full reel coming down. The device seems to be simple enough so that the average man can handle it.

As I said in the first place the machine is decidedly ingenious, and seems to be practical. I watched the thing reverse several times, and it worked to perfection.

Mr. Fredericks is now placing these machines on the market, and as soon as a few of them have been put out and given practical tests in operating rooms I shall be glad to report further on the proposition. I hope and believe it will prove to be all that Mr. Fredericks claims—and that is considerable.

The device has been approved by the Department of State Fire Marshall, State of Ohio.

If I Were an Exhibitor.

F. H. Madison, whose address is missing, says:

> If I had a good ventilating system I would advertise: "First run air, and first run pictures." If I wanted to avoid anything that suggested the possibility of fire I would not use the word "celluloid" in my advertising. "Celluloid classic" sounds fine, but not reassuring. If I had proper projection, I would watch my press notices and not allow it to be advertised that a film would be "flashed on the screen." That sounds as if it were the regular policy to speed the pictures. If I ran five reels or more I would not advertise "A mile of moving pictures." The average mind instinctively rebels at the fancied ordeal to the eyes. If I had good operators, machines and screen and could secure competent, unbiased judges, I would promote a projection contest among the operators of the city.

I have used the foregoing largely on account of the last clause. That is not at all a bad idea, and, perhaps, could be carried out to good purpose for all concerned in the smaller cities where there are not more than a half dozen theaters, always, of course, provided competent, unbiased judges could, as Brother Madison says, be obtained. Undoubtedly if such a contest were inaugurated, particularly if prizes were offered, or a medal in lieu thereof, the various operators taking part in the contest would learn considerable during the contest. Naturally they would strive hard to excel, and in so doing, would doubtless examine their picture very closely, find out what its faults were, and how to remedy them. The only difficulty with a test of this kind would be in fairly judging the work of operators who were working under different conditions—different size pictures, different amperages, different screens and different projectors. But, notwithstanding this drawback, I really think there is something in the idea which could be worked out into practical benefit.

No Kick Coming.

E. L. Jorda, Waco, Texas, says:

> I have a motiograph machine which I have encased in a small box, attached a photo lens, webbed the shutter from one wing to the other, added a flat aperture plate with a larger opening, and have thus made a camera which works good. I have taken pictures with it, developed them myself and the result is excellent. If I were to take pictures with this machine could anybody have a kick coming? I mean, for instance, the Enterprise Optical Company, manufacturers of the motiograph.

Not a kick in the world, Brother Jorda! Go right ahead and take pictures to your heart's content. I have no doubt but the Enterprise Optical Company would be glad to sell you unlimited numbers of projectors to make over into cameras, if you want them. I would like to see a sample of the film you take with that outfit. Send me three or four inches, will you?

A MOMENT OF MADNESS (Edison), Nov. 17.—A plot with a theme of love and jealousy which serves to entertain for the moment the casual observer, written by John Hardin and directed by Langdon West. Some good scenes are shown which are well photographed, on board a yacht where a tragedy occurs. Gertrude McCoy and Edward Earle have the principal roles and are well supported. It might be considered as an average release.

THE SERVANT QUESTION (Essanay), Nov. 17.—While not an original plot, it is, nevertheless, amusing and entertaining, on account of the mix-ups and misrepresentations. Rapley Holmes and Ruth Stonehouse demonstrate that they can produce laughs without much difficulty (Such is art). Leo White and Lillian Drew, with others, are good helpers. This comedy is above the ordinary.

THE PEACH AT THE BEACH (Kalem), Nov. 17.—This comedy demonstrates that Marshal Neilan has thought up some funny situations for Ruth Roland and Lloyd V. Hamilton, supported by Lucille Kellar, Bud Duncan, Chance Ward and Dick Rosson; also numerous others. There are scenes in this offering, which without apparent effort, are productive of hearty laughter.

SHE WAS THE OTHER (Lubin), Nov. 17.—A comedy that is quite original in conception, by Epes Winthrop Sargent, which demonstrates how a chief of police induces his force to take pride in their personal appearance by appointing a female inspector. On the same reel with "Cheap Transportation." Interesting and amusing.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION (Lubin), Nov. 17.—A conglomeration of impossible occurrences that are more absurd than laughable. On the same reel with "She was the Other."

THE SHERIFF'S REWARD (Selig), Nov. 17.—A cowboy drama, featuring Tom Mix as the sheriff, who is also the producer. It has to do with a pretty young ranch owner (Goldie Colwell), who has an awful time with her foreman. The cast contains the usual assortment of cowboys, cattle rustlers, etc. Some thrilling scenes occur and wild backgrounds are prominent which have been splendidly photographed. Those in the cast do full justice to their parts. This is a meritorious Western picture.

BUSTER BROWN AND THE GERMAN BAND (Edison), Nov. 18.—An Outcault comedy in which Buster engages a German band to entertain his mother and her guests who are indulging in a game of bridge. They are incensed at the squeak of the clarionette, etc. In an orgy of discord and revolt the goat and Tige object also, charging around the corner they scatter band and everything else, right and left. The cast in this production is made up of leading Edison players, but the vehicle in which they ride seems to be void of the proper capacity.

A MILLINERY MIX-UP (Edison), Nov. 18.—A comedy by J. Edward Hungerford, directed by Charles M. Seay, featuring Dan Mason and Gladys Hulette, assisted by a clever cast. Several amusing complications occur. On the same reel with "Buster Brown."

THE FABLE OF PROVING THAT SPONGERS ARE FOUND IN A DRUG STORE (Essanay), Nov. 18.—A George Ade comedy, in which there is engrafted more truth than poetry. Scene: A new drug store on the corner, inflicted with a customer who wants to know the correct time; another who wants a peek into the city directory, and who did not know if Murphy was spelled with an "F." Then came the girl who wanted a postage stamp and another who wanted a free almanac. Finally one came with a prescription and the day's business showed a profit of $1.76.

THE BROKEN "X" (Selig), Nov. 18.—Illustrating how the law overtakes depredators, eventually, regardless of their social condition. The scenario is by J. A. Lacy. Stella Razeto and Guy Oliver are featured supported by a clever cast. While the theme is not productive of wholesomeness it holds close attention. There is a satisfactory ending where the prominent depredators are finally brought to justice by the Secret Service agents. It pleases.

FIXING THEIR DADS (Vitagraph), Nov. 18.—A conglomeration of love episodes which involves a young couple and their respective parents—who are widowers—hot on the track of a widow (Flora Finch). With the assistance of Dorothy, a city friend, the young couple thoroughly demoralize the two old papas and win them over. How they accomplish this is very edifying and amusing. Mrs. F. M. Wright is the author and Geo. D. Baker is the producer. A very laughable comedy.

HEN-PECK GETS A NIGHT OFF (Biograph), Nov. 19.—A boisterous comedy, which includes the rare feature—a stag candy-pull party. Some of the action is quite amusing and is rewarded with laughter. On the same reel with "A Fowl Deed."

A FOWL DEED (Biograph), Nov. 19.—On the same reel with "Hen-Peck Gets a Night Off." This comedy contains considerable merit in a legitimate sense and is very well acted. In the ending all the characters are under arrest, caused by a duplication of shirt-waists.

A HORSE ON SOPHIE (Essanay), Nov. 19.—While the Slippery Slim, Mustang Pete, Sophie Clutts' offerings are always laughable, this is really a superior one and worth the viewing. Talk about a deacon's getting the best in a horse trade—if you don't believe it you can see it fully demonstrated in this picturization. This release is greeted with spontaneous laughter.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 76 (Selig), Nov. 19.—Interesting and topical and war scenes, a general review of which will be found in the advance notices on page 1272, issue of Nov. 28, 1914 (this number).

TOO MUCH BURGLAR (Vitagraph), Nov. 19.—Maurice Costello and Robert Gaillord have produced W. A. Tremayne's comedy of the above caption in good shape, with a splendid cast of large dimension. Many laughable scenes are embraced in the plot, which is not altogether new but is well handled in a manner that makes it amusing and interesting. An enjoyable offering.

THE UNKNOWN COUNTRY (Lubin), Nov. 20.—A picture which holds attention on account of its weirdness. Two fellow-medical students have delved deeply into the occult and one has developed a high degree of hypnotic power. There is a love theme running through in which the students are rivals. The acting is well done. The settings are appropriate and the photography is up to the standard.

THE MYSTERIOUS BLACK BOX (Selig), Nov. 20.—A comedy picture of the farce order, written by W. E. Wing and produced by Norval MacGregor. The plot of this offering has many funny points which are brought out artistically by the members of the cast, John Lancaster, Lyllian Brown Leighton, Elsie Greeson and Sid Smith. The trouble is all caused by a little black box which is thought to be a kodak. It is received with continuous laughter.

THE PROFESSIONAL SCAPEGOAT (Vitagraph), Nov. 20.—A comedy by Charles Brown and Sidney Drew, that introduces a new character with the above title, who is used to molify customers who have complaints to make over purchase. Mr. Drew makes this a very funny character and is well supported by an able cast, including Jane Morrow, Harry Davenport and Courtlandt Van Deusen. An amusing little love theme of a rather comical nature is embraced in the plot which ends happily, also comically. This is a regular comedy release.

THE GIRL AND THE MISER (Biograph), Nov. 20.—Depicting life in a village. This is an appealing picture drama and those who are living in small towns, and city residents who have migrated from these environments, will appreciate the homely scenes that go straght to the heart. Irene Howley in her rendition of the girl deserves great credit for the simplicity and naturalness which she displays in the leading character. The whole cast deserves special mention. The costuming is perfect. This picture cannot fail to please any audience.

FATTY AND THE SHYSTER LAWYER (Kalem), Nov. 20.—A farcical comedy written by J. L. Morgan featuring John E. Brennan, burlesquing the methods shyster lawyers use to obtain business. Quite an amount of legal knowledge is displayed in this offering on the part of the producers. Mr. Brennan is made the victim as plaintiff in a suit against a street railroad, from injuries received while alighting from a car. There are laughable scenes in court and a lively chase. The audience enjoys it immensely.

BLACKSMITH BEN (Biograph), Nov. 21.—A story of village life in which the village blacksmith is the leading character role (Mr. J. A. Hall). The theme in construction, together with the backgrounds, both interior and exterior make this a very attractive number. There is one very thrilling scene in the blacksmith's shop. With on or two exceptions the acting on the part of the supporting cast is effective. An absorbing and unusual story worth seeing.

DICKSON'S DIAMONDS (Edison), Nov. 21.—Taken from the famous Felix Boyd series entitled "Below the Dead Line." Adapted by Scott Campbell. Robert Conness, Richard Neill and Carlton King are the principals. A detective story concerning the loss of the contents of a safe in a jewelry store, amounting to $200,000. The methods employed by the detectives in running down the real culprit makes this a very edifying visualization. Langdon West has given very careful attention to details in the direction.

BRONCHO BILLY'S SCHEME (Essanay), Nov. 21.—A western drama which eliminates the usual extreme roughness, although it is thrilling in many instances. Mr. Anderson essays the role of a western physician and introduces a clever and original scheme to rescue a young girl from the hands of outlaws, holding her for ransom. An attractive western release.

THE PLOT OF THE R. R. CUT (Kalem), Nov. 21.—The second episode of "The Hazards of Helen," featuring Helen Holmes in this series of railroad happenings. It is a story of love and jealousy. The acting is exceptional and scenes thrilling, especially where Helen repairs the telegraph wires and the explosion on the side of a hill. A release of a very exciting nature.

THE TALE OF A COAT (Lubin), Nov. 21.—An amusing entertainer written and produced by J. A. Murphy, concerning an automobile coat of a decided pattern. It is stole, sold, identified, fought over, etc., in all of which there are rapid action and funny situations. On the same reel with "The Daddy of Them All."

THE DADDY OF THEM ALL (Lubin), Nov. 21.—A very funny comedy that is greeted with continuous laughter. The theme is simple and original and the author, Frank O. Andrews, deserves credit for the conception. It is well acted, in a reasonable way. On the same reel with "The Tale of a Coat."

HER SACRIFICE (Selig), Nov. 21.—A smooth running little comedy, the scenes laid in a quiet little village by the seashore. The characters are principally made up of fisherfolk. The scenes along the rugged shore are enticing and finely photographed. Kathlyn Williams and Wheeler Oakman are featured and ably supported by a good cast. There is much heart interest and human nature in the story. Collin Campbell is author and producer. This is a pleasing release.

SWEEDIE AT THE FAIR (Essanay), Nov. 23.—It is hard to tell in this picture which is the funniest, Sweedie or her donkey, anyhow, they fail to take any "blue ribbons" at the County Fair. The complications that take place and the results certainly keep the husky cook busy. The most laughable scene is where Sweedie places her "Donk" in a racing car and speeds around the track, with the police as a hot second. She succeeds in wrecking a tent and causes an explosion which wrecks the machine. Spectators will enjoy this release.

ALL ON ACCOUNT OF THE CHEESE (Biograph), Nov. 23.—A hip-hurrah comedy, embracing a burlesque police force and "imaginative" burglars, that prove to be mice, stuck on fly paper. The caricatures of the police force are a little more reasonable than usual. A moderate laugh producer. On the same reel with "Thrown off the Throne."

THROWN OFF THE THRONE (Biograph), Nov. 23.—A dumbwaiter comic opera which will take you to the top flat and deliver the goods. As a burlesque it is certainly successful. Evidently expense has not been considered regarding mounting and costuming. It is received with continuous laughter. On the same reel with "All on Account of the Cheese."

THE LEVEL (Vitagraph), Nov. 23.—A picture drama containing a great amount of originality and forcefulness and which is presented in a most convincing way by an able cast, made up of Myrtle Gonzalez, William Duncan, Alfred D. Vosburgh, Al. Mower and "Duke" (who is not the worst actor in the case). This story, by Ethel Hill, is a virile one and the characters selected ably sustain the requirements of their individual parts. The strength which Miss Gonzalez evidences in her role qualifies her as an actress of ability. A strong production.

DOC YAK PLAYS GOLF (Selig), Nov. 23.—On the same reel with "Out of Petticoat Lane." An animated cartoon by Sidney Smith, depicting the ludicrous adventures and escapades of Doc Yak.

HIS CHORUS GIRL WIFE (Edison), Nov. 23.—A Thanksgiving story by Ashley Miller, who also directed. A little offering which contains much of human nature, devoid of thrilling scenes; heart interest pertains strongly. Gladys Hulette, Harry Beaumont, Robert Brower, William West and Mrs. Wallace Erskine, a cast that assures artistic production, make of this visualization one that will linger in the memory of the spectator.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL NO. 77 (Selig), Nov. 23.—A very interesting number which must be seen to be appreciated, concerning Christmas presents being sent to Europe from Boston; American Federation of Labor convention at Philadelphia; Yale-Princeton football game; numerous interesting European war scenes in the north of France. The most interesting scenes are locations from whence our Thanksgiving dinners come, celery farms in Michigan, cranberry bogs near Cape Cod, including various scenes of the gathering, assorting, shipping and delivery, preparatory to service on the table; also turkey farms in Connecticut and the turkeys which go with the cranberry sauce.

ERNEST MALTRAVERS (Biograph), Nov. 17.—A two-part visualization from the novel of the same caption, by Bulwer Lytton, which has been universally read by people all over the world. The cast is an ideal one, and each deserves special mention. The director has taken especial pains as to scenes and costumes. Most of the scenes are very dramatic and absorbing interest pertains throughout the two reels. The camera man deserves mention for his clear and careful work. This release is really superior in every respect.

HOPE FOSTER'S MOTHER (Vitagraph), Nov. 17.—A special feature in two parts, written by Anne Story Allen and John Alwin and produced by Lionel Belmore. Edith Storey, as the daughter, and Mary Maurice, as the mother, supported by Ada Gifford, Anders Randolf, George Stevens and Marianna Trench, make of this a most superior visualized production. The theme is so beautiful and heart-gripping the pantomimic acting of all in the cast, especially on the parts of Miss Storey and lovable Mary Maurice, so artistic, that it makes of this offering one to be carried in the memory of the observer for an indefinite time. The vision scene is par-excellent. A story of mother love that is touching in the extreme.

THE MARRIAGE WAGER (Lubin), Nov. 18.—A melo-dramatic visualization in two parts, which are full of morbid and sensational scenes. There is a romantic love story which is productive of considerable interest running through the plot which has a happy ending; the redeeming feature. The acting and photography are adequate. Those who are given to sensationalism will probably enjoy this offering.

HIS NEMESIS (Kalem), Nov. 18.—A two-act modern picture drama featuring Helen Holmes, supported by a carefully-selected cast, including the author and producer, J. P. McGowan. There are many scenes in this production that border on the melodramatic. Later, there is a redeeming quality where the girl who has avenged herself, becomes a victim of conscience and expiates her offence and becomes a religious worker, befriending her former associates. A thrilling release.

ON SUSPICION (Lubin), Nov. 19.—A two-part picture production that contains many complications, but such things could happen. The theme of the plot hinges on a case of mistaken identity that involves the major portion of the characters. Intensity and suspense are prominent attributes of the plot. This picture, while it has some shortcomings, is well acted and photographed and the director deserves credit for careful work.

WHAT COULD SHE DO (Edison), Nov. 20.—This three-part picture-play has been reviewed at length, by Louis Reeves Harrison, in the Moving Picture World, and can be found on page 766, issue of Nov. 7, 1914.

THE MEANS AND THE END (Essanay), Nov. 20.—A two-part picture drama of a peculiar type which is very interesting in its development. It is well produced in every respect. The leading characters are rendered by Rapley Holmes, Richard C. Travers, Gerda Holmes and Lester Cuneo. This production is a meritorious one.

MARY JANE ENTERTAINS (Vitagraph), Nov. 21.—A special feature in two parts. A comedy must possess considerable merit to hold an audience and keep them laughing through two reels of film; but this picture fulfils the mission. Flora Finch, as Mary Jane, a nervy housemaid, and Hughie Mack as Percy, her grocer-boy mash, lose no opportunities given them in the portrayal of the parts. Mary Jane certainly enjoys a night's fun, but loses her job to pay for it. Exhibitors can bank on this being a good one.

OUT OF PETTICOAT LANE (Selig,) Nov. 23.—A melodramatic picture by Gilson Willets, in two parts, in which he seems to have attempted to incorporate all the thrills that he could "think up." The theme is the romance of a laundry girl, and the experiences she encounters are wild and wonderful. Adda Gleason and Edith Johnson are featured. Those that are fond of sensation will be gratified by viewing this picture.

THE THEFT OF THE CROWN JEWELS (Kalem), Nov. 23.—A two-act drama of the Alice Joyce series, "The Million Dollar Jewels Production," so much heralded by this producing company. James B. Ross, Guy Coombs, Jere Austin and Mary Ross are the supporting principals. This picture contains many sumptuous interior settings. The photography is faulty in some respects, from the fact that the angels have been poorly selected; ruining the proper effect. Thrilling aboard-ship scnes are commendable, and the ending not only contains an agreeable, but also a satisfactory surprise. It is more than an ordinary release.

Independent

OLD ENOUGH TO BE HER GRANDPA (American), Nov. 20.—Pleasing little farce, brightly conceived, well acted and quite amusing. Old grandad, owner of a department store, schemes with one of his pretty stenographers to get his grandson away from an actress.

A BUM MISTAKE (Princess), Nov. 20.—An eccentric number with some amusing spots in the middle and close of the reel, though the start is rather vague. The girl is conveyed in a carriage with two men dressed up as a horse pulling it. This is a fair comedy.

ETHEL HAS A STEADY (No. 11 of the "Bill" Series) (Komic), Nov. 22.—Fay Tincher has the best stenog costume yet, and as a whole, the piece makes an unusually laughable comic offering.

A MESSENGER OF GLADNESS (Thanhouser), Nov. 22.—Just a half-reel skit featuring the Kidlet as a messenger of Thanksgiving cheer to numerous unhappy people. Slight but well photographed.

NATURE'S CELEBRITIES (Thanhouser), Nov. 22.—On same reel with above. Excellent close up views of the African chameleon and the Indian cobra. The first is a droll comedian of the animal world and the second is very "shuddery" and at the same time fascinating. Good nature subject.

HIS TAKING WAYS (Keystone), Nov. 23.—A typical nonsense number, with Chester Conklin in the cast. He locks his hated rival in a trunk, after an amusing card game, and trunk and occupant are given a rough trip, pursued by the police. This is quite pleasing comedy of its type.

MUTUAL GIRL NO. 45 (Reliance), Nov. 23.—It is drawing near the fifty-two mark that is to end it, we are told. The quality is pleasing. The story is slight, but is made of fresh and effective stuff and has not been forced, as many of its kind are, into the teacup thunders. It will please.

AS A MAN THINKS (Beauty), Nov. 24.—The timid man is told by a fortune teller that he is to become a man of iron will. Now he thinks differently, and even his wife obeys him. He gets a rise in salary. There are good laughs in it and it makes an excellent farce offering.

SAMMY'S VACATION (Crystal), Nov. 24.—Sammy goes to the country to see his girl. Another girl is there and eventually two couples get into a series of quarrels. The eccentric police force is the most amusing feature of this, but the plot is not at all strong.

ANOTHER CHANCE (Majestic), Nov. 24.—An acceptable story produced by Donald Crisp; it gives the adventures of a man just out of prison who has a hard time getting honest work and comes near being sent back to prison He had helped a cripple and is helped in turn when the police really have him—he has been caught with counterfeit coins in his rooms. They are declared real by the sergeant, much to the amazement of both detective and the man. It is well put on and makes a good offering.

THE ARCHAEOLOGIST (American), Nov. 25.—One will find many scenes in this picture that are wholly charming. The story is farcical, yet has a touch of apparent earnestness that makes its characters unpleasant rather than comical. The photography is fine.

THEY NEVER KNEW (Reliance), Nov. 25.—A familiar type of story in which the girl starts to elope with the city man, but is rescued by her country lover. The latter marries her himself, but the situations are handled in such a casual way that they are not very effective. The photography is good.

HIS HALTED CAREER (Keystone), Nov. 26.—Charles Murray appears in this as a painter who goes to work in an apartment. He paints stripes on the butler's clothes and drinks the owner's wine. Later there is a good combination of fun and excitement when he hangs on the scaffolding outside. A good piece of character work with some exaggerated situations added.

SLOW BUT SURE (Rex), Nov. 26.—A well-photographed light comedy number, featuring Ben Wilson and Frances Nelson. The clubmen find the girl with a sprained ankle and all fall in love with her. One has an airship, another an auto, but the man with the horse finally wins her. An entertaining light subject.

THE GHOST OF THE MINE (Eclair), Nov. 29.—A typical Western offering, in which a young Easterner goes to take charge of a mine. The half-breed in charge tells him the story of what happened when his uncle came into possession of it years before. The action and photography are good and the plot of about average interest.

A BLIGHTED SPANIARD (L-Ko), Nov. 29.—The opening scenes in this low comedy of Mexican life are pretty and attractive. The fun is also appealing, but drops off in quality when Bombardio loses his trousers and begins running around in his underwear. A barrel of dynamite is introduced to keep things moving.

A LONELY SALVATION (Victor), Nov. 30.—A girl thief is caught by the owner of a house. He hides her from the police and gives her a chance to go West. Love develops, and when he fails to write she returns to find him dead. The closing scenes are quite pathetic. This makes a fairly strong offering, with Mary Fuller and Charles Ogle in the leads.

CHARLIE WOOES VIVIAN (Crystal), Dec. 1.—Charlie is boss of the office and Vivian sues him for breach of promise, but a compromise is affected. Fair comedy with a slight plot.

A BARBER SHOP FEUD (Crystal), Dec. 1.—The two barbers are rivals for the manicure girl's affections. There are a number of complications but nothing of an extremely amusing nature. On the same reel with above.

THE WISE GUYS (Joker), Dec. 2.—The plot in this is not very strong, but Ernest Shields gets considerable amusement out of his part as a monocle-wearing dude. The chief situation is that of three lovers calling on the same girl at one time. A slight offering with some amusement in it

THE YOUNG PHILANTHROPIST (Imp), Dec. 3.—Number eleven of the Universal Boy series. Matty's trips into the tenement section of New York brings out some decidedly interesting scenes. The care of babies is featured principally. This gives a fine inside view of conditions on the East Side of New York and should accomplish some good missionary work toward improving conditions. The scenes are bright and interesting rather than depressing.

PAPA BUYS A BALE OF COTTON (Victor), Dec. 4.—A novel comedy number of timely interest. The patriotic father orders one bale of cotton to help the South and the lover raises the number to one hundred. The house is filled with bales and the resulting situations are original and amusing. The close could have been stronger, but the reel is pleasing as it stands. The cast is good.

THE CIRCLE OF GOLD (Frontier), Dec. 5.—Quite a pleasing and well-pictured story in which a girl marries a young man at her father's request. He drinks, but later reforms. This is well handled and the photography is attractive.

A DREAM OF A PAINTING (Joker), Dec. 5.—Mr. Peck visits an art museum with his wife. During his dream the Egyptian princess, played by Louise Fazenda, comes to life and steps out of the picture. Trouble ensues with the wife, and when he thinks he is being stabbed Mr. Peck wakes up to find his wife poking him with an umbrella. This is only fairly amusing.

Independent Specials

THE SECRET OF THE SLEEPING HOUSE (Thanhouser Syndicate Corp.), November.—This is Episode 2 of the Zudora series. It carries with it an air of oriental mystery. Zudora saves her lover from certain death in the contracting cell. The use of fumes from the lotus flowers to put the Hindu band to sleep was a novel feature. This pays particular attention to settings and costuming and proves an attractive offering throughout. Zudora gives a good account of herself in working out this problem and the series promises well for the future.

HIS RESPONSIBILITY (Reliance), Nov. 21.—A two-reel picture with Irene Hunt, W. E. Lawrence and Ralph Lewis. Good acting and natural staging make the picture a good offering—its story is fair. At the climax, the husband, his money gone he thinks, has hired a thug to kill him so that the wife and kiddie will have the insurance and enough to live on. There's a letter at home that will make things good; but the wife forgets to give it to him, and he starts toward the place where the thug is to be. Some detectives see and follow the thug and make an arrest. The dissappointed man gets his glad letter.

THE SAVING GRACE (Majestic), Nov. 22.—A two-reeler with Dorothy Gish in the leading role as a tatterdemalion daughter of a western tough. The new minister tries to get the girl to go to school. Some slight incident, a dropped letter, makes her think the minister is a married man and she tells her father he lied to her and it makes trouble. There is a strong comedy touch in all this as it is put on, although the farcical minister is too much like a stage property to add effectively to the fun. Dorothy has an owl as big as herself. The piece gives her a fine chance and she does some remarkably strong work playing this girl; but the mystery is in why Dorothy Gish should mimic the comic work of Fay Tincher (in the early scenes she does so) when she has comic expression that is even better than Miss Tincher's

MRS. VAN RUYTER'S STRATAGEM (Thanhouser), Nov. 24.—A two-reel number which makes entertaining comedy out of an idea that is quite familiar in fiction. The wealthy aunt exchanges places with her housekeeper and entertains her relatives, wondering to whom she will leave her money. Of course the right person, a pretty girl, is brought into the story and turns out to be a missing niece. This is carefully constructed and carries the interest of the observer in a pleasing way. It makes a comedy drama somewhat above the average.

THE COWARD (Imp), Nov. 30.—A two-reel story in which Edw. Mortimer and Dorothy Phillips appear as a young couple just married. Following the wedding scenes the young wife develops a craving for liquor, which caused her mother's death. The husband remains home from war to help her in her fight, which she conquers only after the birth of their child. The story is not of the strongest, owing to the nature of the plot. It has, however, a good lesson in it. The cast and photography are also pleasing.

THE MASTER KEY (Universal Special), Nov. 30.—Third Episode. This two-reel installment swings along in a decidedly interesting way. Gallon learns the truth about Wilkerson's presence. Harry Carter in the latter part develops a strong brand of villainy. Wilkerson succeeds in having himself appointed superintendent of the mine when Gallon dies. The strike scenes were splendidly handled, a great body of men taking part in them. Robert Leonard, as John Dale, saves Wilkerson from the infuriated mob after being discharged and quells the strike for the girl's sake. Bad blood exists between himself and Wilkerson. A strong installment.

A ROMANCE OF OLD HOLLAND (Broncho), Dec. 2.—A two-reel offering with pleasing Dutch settings. The plot is quite obvious and has a melodramatic turn, but is full of interest. The manner in which the young hero escapes an ocean grave and wins the girl from the plotting Van Spratt is well pictured. The scenes are attractive both on land and sea and the cast is a pleasing one. In the end the hero pays off the debts of the girl's father and marries her. The photography is very good throughout.

THE GIRL STAGE DRIVER (Eclair), Dec. 2.—A two-reel Western number with the settings in Arizona. This is picturesque and pleasing from a scenic standpoint and well photographed. The action develops two stage holdups; the hero is twice captured by the bandits and twice saved by the girl. The plot has very little suspense about it and for this reason does not hold the interest as strongly as it should. The settings and photography are the strongest features of this number.

THE VIGIL (Domino), Dec. 3. A two-reel subject enacted entirely by Japanese characters, including Tsuri Oaki, heroine of numerous successes along this line. This is well photographed throughout and contains an entertaining story, with a number of dramatic moments in it. Owaru lays a villainous scheme with which to bring discredit upon his favored rival, but the girl plays upon his superstitions and brings about a confession. The close is dramatic and the picture on the whole a strong offering.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SEAVIEW HOTEL (Rex), Dec. 3.—This is Ben Wilson's first appearance in his new affiliations. He plays the part of a detective in a two-reel production. The story has to do with some mysterious thefts occurring in a large hotel. The detective has a number of nocturnal visits and is threatened with death unless he leaves. He does so, but returns with a woman assistant, in disguise. He succeeds in rounding up the mysterious criminal, who turns out to be the clerk. A good mystery yarn, well constructed and with a good pull to it.

MOTHER OF THE SHADOWS (Kaybee), Dec. 4.—A two-reel offering unfolding an unusual Western story. Tsuri Aoki appears as an Indian girl wronged by a young lieutenant. When the child is born the Indians bring her to the fort and she is told to pick out the man. A delicate situation, but very well handled. The succeeding scenes are stirring and beautifully pictured, the photography being strikingly clear. A fine Western offering.

THE HEART OF A MAGDALEN (Powers), Dec. 4.—A two-reel number with a cast including Edna Maison, Bert Hadley, Joe King and Beatrice Van. The story of the notorious woman who consents to pose as the Madonna is entertainingly developed. The photography might have been better in a few places. The plot leads up to quite an unusual situation where Clarinne attends the studio reception uninvited and is tempted to ruin the masterpiece she posed for. Edna Maison makes this character an interesting one and the story itself ranks above the average in certain respects.

FOUNDLINGS OF FATHER TIME (101 Bison), Dec. 5.—This two-reel offering, written by Isadore Bernstein, is a study of poverty. Murdock MacKenzie and Mrs. Benson appear as an old couple who are ejected from one home after another, until they finally go out in the rain and die locked in each other's arms. This story is sad without being morbid. It is naturally and sincerely acted and makes a strong appeal to the sympathies. It should well serve the injunction of the author as announced at the beginning: "To those who have plenty to seek out the poor."

THE LOVE OF PRINCESS YOLANDE (Warners).—A two-reel idyllic story in costume. Princess Yolande has to marry the neighboring prince; but is given a few days holiday before the event. Out in the fields with her humble friend, a shepherdess, she falls in love with a wandering minstrel and, when the prince comes to claim her, she finds that he and the minstrel are the same. It has pretty costumes and many graceful scenes, but is not wholly poetical nor wholly satisfying.

FATHER—A MEMBER OF THE PURITY LEAGUE (Warner's).—Rough, comic picture; many of its incidents will appeal as laughable, even if they are rather inelegant. The Premier studio made it.

CAMILLE, AS SHE NEVER WAS (Warner's).—One-reel burlesque under the Superba brand. It is a big, fat Camille and an Armand who gets three dollars a week. The offering will no doubt appeal to the many as very laughable.

A MENDER OF WAYS (Warner's).—There is a situation in this Premier offering that has possibilities; but only fair use has been made of them. The woman had once been loved by a divinity student, but had not heard from him and had married another. He has turned out a drunkard. A new minister comes to the village. The tough tries to force him to drink, gets licked and has to promise to come to church. The woman sees in the new minister her old lover. It is a pretty well acted picture, and, if there had been no pistols in it, it might not have been so trite in the way it is worked out. It will hold attention as it is.

SHOT IN THE FRACAS (Warner's).—A burlesque in which the tramp is too big for the village cops and the chief takes down the sign warning all vagrants off. Of course things begin to happen in the village and the action of the picture is most lively, though there are some put-up falls in it. It is an offering of a popular kind just now, rough and speedy with eccentric camera work to make running comic.

STOCKINGS (Warner's). The burlesque sleuth has a bad nightmare which, we think, is a real experience till he wakes up. Striped stockings are the sleuth's clue and th e clue leads him into all kinds of scrapes. It is not elegant; but it is not offensive either.

MAX AND THE FAIR M. D. (Electic—Pathe).—It is a Max picture and, if it fails to make the audience laugh, something's wrong with the audience.

WHEN FATE WAS KIND (Eclectic—Pathe).—A three-reel melodrama in which the hero, a rather weak character, nearly falls into the trap of the villain who wants to make trouble for him with his wife. He thinks at first that fate was kind and kept him from inclosing the check to the other woman; but finds in the end that his brother has substituted a harmless business announcement. It is fairly well acted and the story is easily followed. The photography is perfect.

SLIPPERY SADIE (Warner's).—A one-reel offering with an a la Keystone burlesque. It is full of run and tumble kind of action; but has many incidents that are lively enough to make it go well in the majority of houses. It was made by the Starlight studio.

ALL AT SEA (Warner's).—A one-reel Albuquerque offering. This picture has some lively and unusual water scenes that are beautifully photographed. The two on this split reel are worth while.

RURAL ROMEROS (Warner's).—On the same reel with the foregoing. Country lovers' farce with dad's choice a sissy boy and the girl's choice a husky farm hand. It is he who throws the sickly eggs through the window and dad chases an innocent by-stander. There is fun and laughter in it.

THE LITTLE REBEL (Warner's).—A three-reel offering giving a love story of Civil War times, but fortunately without battle scenes. It is one of the Gene Gauntier pictures made while the company was directed by Sid Olcott and is an offering that we can recommend to exhibitors; because it gives a very pleasant taste again of fruits once liked and still likable. It is quite different from the merely commercial spy picture and its comedy love story, although along well-beaten lines, has a meaning and a freshness all its own.

STUNG BY THE BEE (Warner's Premier).—A one-reel Premier offering with enough fun and life to keep it acceptable; but the situation has been worked out with much more convincing humor by others, among them the Edison players.

BRACKEN BACK WITH BALBOA.

Bertram Bracken, director of the six-reel attraction, "St. Elmo," and scores of other feature films for the Balboa Amusement Producing Company, of Long Beach, California, and who was Gaston Melies' director during his world-wide tour, has resumed work at the Balboa studios, following a vacation of two months. He will be director-general of the six companies of players being organized to produce feature dramas at the Balboa plant and will, under his new, long-time contract with the corporation, receive one of the highest salaries ever paid a producer of first-class films.

Mr. Bracken, besides directing his own group of star players in big productions, will personally supervise the work of the other five directors engaged in staging the feature attractions demanded by the Balboa company's new contract with a film-marketing corporation, under the terms of which the Balboa studios must produce at least a minimum of 6,000 feet of first-class feature film every week. He will also manage the operations of enlarging the studio stages, obtaining additional scenic properties and buildings.

Director Bracken's first production will be a pictorial visualization of Mrs. Augusta Evans' celebrated Southern novel, "Beulah," in six reels, this world-famous story being a sequel to Mrs. Evans' narrative, "St. Elmo." Some of Mr. Bracken's current releases are: "The Square Triangle," "The Test of Manhood," "Heart of the Brute," "The Vow," "The Mask" and "The Winner."

Hobnobbing with Royalty. Scene from "The Education of Mr. Pipp" (All Star).

Eleanor Woodruff Off to the War

Pathe Leading Lady to Head Red Cross Hospital Corps in France.

IF Miss Eleanor Woodruff, Pathe leading lady, holds to her decision to go to the European war as a nurse, the world of the screen will suffer a severe loss. There are too few actresses of Miss Woodruff's type at present in pictures not to give her exit more than passing notice.

Though Miss Woodruff did not get her name in the bright lights on Broadway before her advent into the screen world, she played important parts in "The Gamblers," "Beverley of Graustark," "The Spendthrift," "The Five Frankfurters," and in stock.

Eleanor Woodruff.

At the suggestion of some of her friends she tried pictures and became an instantaneous success. Wonderfully versatile, her chief charm lay in her portrayal of emotional parts. Some of her best known films have been as "Katrina" in "The Last Volunteer," as "Beth" in "All Love Excelling," as "Mrs. Stevens" in "The Stain," as "Helen" in "The Ticket of Leave Man" and others. She has just finished a part in another large production staged and produced for Pathe by George Fitzmaurice, which will be released soon.

Naturally of an intensely sympathetic nature, Miss Woodruff has spent a great deal of her spare time in the interest of Working Girls' Clubs, giving a world of attention to the organization of these and by her personal attendance at the different functions influencing a large number of her friends to take an interest in the aims and objects of these clubs. In this work she has been associated with many of the leading social workers of New York City who have highly praised her quiet but effective work in securing large monetary assistance as well as in making several lecture tours.

After the outbreak of the war in Europe she became actively engaged in the work of the American Red Cross Society. Learning that the French house of Pathe had organized a number of Red Cross corps from their large staff which they had equipped and are maintaining at the front at their own expense, and feeling deeply the shortage of hospital help to care for the large number of wounded and sick, she volunteered for this work feeling that she could be of more assistance to the wounded and suffering by her personal attention. Her offer was accepted as the work of the Pathe Studios had been largely suspended, and she leaves in a week or two to take charge of one of the Pathe field hospitals.

Miss Woodruff's loss to the screen, even temporarily, will be keenly felt by her many friends and admirers who will wish her a safe journey and a freedom from danger which will eventually bring her back to this country, better equipped by her experience to carry on her work.

CALDER JOHNSTONE WITH LEONARD'S REX COMPANY.

Robert Z. Leonard and his company of Rex players are still in San Francisco where they have gone to produce certain scenes in the fifth installment of the Universal great serial, "The Master Key," written by John Fleming Wilson. With them has gone Calder Johnstone, of the scenario desk at the Universal West Coast studios who, together with Mr. Leonard, has been putting into scenario form the stories from Mr. Wilson's pen. In his absence Earl Hewitt, of the regular scenario staff, is handling the contributed scenarios.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

THE proposition to raise the prices of admission to picture houses continues to be the leading topic in publications devoted to the motion picture industry. Up to the present time no opposition to it has developed, yet none of the manufacturers and representatives thus far interviewed have taken a decisive stand on the question of putting the increase into operation. In other words, no one has ventured to say "Do it now." It is quite evident that a general rise in prices need not be looked for. The various questions raised by those who have been interviewed indicate a preponderance of belief that the producers cannot successfully urge it because the exhibitors, as a whole, cannot respond. One of the oldest producers in the business very wisely says: "The problem is a territorial one." This view has been expressed in many other quarters. Another producer says that the question is "up to" the manufacturers. "You cannot expect to get ten cents admission for films that are worth no more than five cents. If admission prices are to be raised to ten cents, or more, the standard of film productions must keep pace with the prices."

* * *

All this is very logical and it brings to the front a situation that reflects ultimate success of the movement for increased prices by a a system of elimination. This system will involve three chief operations. First: The maintenance and advancement of standard by the manufacturers. Second: An arrangement between manufacturers and rental exchanges by which fair rental charges will be fixed for films in accordance with their standard. Third: A policy to be adopted by the exhibitors whereby those charging the higher prices, or who may raise their prices, will eliminate from their houses films that do not come up to the standard they require. "This," said one of the best known experts in the business, "will gradually relegate the cheap grade of films to the proper territories and automatically cheap films and theaters will gradually disappear."

* * *

An exhibitor who controls five houses in one of the large western cities was a visitor to this city a few days ago and spoke freely on the question of increased prices. His views are in line with the elimination system. "I have five theaters in my city, which I have graded in accordance with their locations. At two of them I charge five cents admission and the programmes are made up of the cheap grade of films. By that I mean films that are cheap principally on account of their age. Two of the other houses I run on the ten-cent basis and the standard of the programmes is correspondingly raised. The fifth house is first class in every respect. It cost $50,000 to transform it into an up-to-date picture house. I have an orchestra of twenty-six pieces and the films are the best the market affords, regardless of price. The prices at this house are 15, 20 and 25 cents. You will see that I have three grades of patronage to which I cater, but I am convinced that the number will ultimately be reduced to two. The ten-cent houses will, I believe, continue to survive for some time; but the sentiment of the patrons of the five-cent houses convinces me that, with the revival of industrial conditions, I will be able to convert them to the ten-cent basis without danger of losing patronage. With the assistance of my staffs I am educating the people and bringing them to a realization of conditions. I treat the cheaper patrons with all the courtesy accorded my high price people and, when they complain that the pictures furnished are not as good as those shown in the ten-cent houses, it is explained that they cannot expect ten cents' worth for five. We also urge them to visit the other houses when they can afford it so that they may see the difference in the shows and I think I have them going. The proposed increase in rental prices does not worry me. When conditions warrant me in changing the five-cent houses to the next grade I naturally will expect to pay a corresponding increase for the standard of service and I will have no fear of competition of the five-cent grade because I know the people of the localities I refer to are ready to pay for the better class of entertainment when they can afford it. It is by comparison that I hope to ultimately eliminate the five-cent business."

"Some exhibitors," continued the exhibitor, "may contend that I am more fortunate than they are and that the population of their localities is such that five-cent houses alone can exist in them. I do not agree with this. Most people who make this claim lack either courage or foresight. The five-cent houses are doomed and those who are in the rut will eventually find themselves face to face with ten-cent competition when it will be too late to stem the tide. Money is pouring into the exhibition business from all parts of the country. Investors are daily forming companies for the establishment of larger and better houses for the better class of exhibitions and the single-handed five-cent man will be eventually driven to the wall. His only salvation is to improve his property and service before the other fellow comes along. But the responsibility for this evolution does not rest alone with the exhibitor. The manufacturers and rental exchanges have an important part in the game. You know, of course, that the exchanges claim they must get all the use they can out of films in order to get proper financial returns from them; that sharp, cut-rate competition has obliged them to keep films in circulation as long as the sprocket holes last. That is why, they very justly claim, so many five-cent houses continue in existence. On one of the principal streets of your city is a five-cent house owned by a man who recently built a ten-cent house only two doors distant. He did this because he learned other parties were arranging to build a ten-cent house on the next block. The improved service in the new house has gradually drawn patronage from the old place, so that it is barely paying expenses. I asked him why he did not close the cheap place and he said he renewed the lease to stop others from getting hold of it with a cut-rate service. He told me he would close the place instantly if the exchanges were obliged to charge rental prices that would make it impossible to supply five-cent houses. His position is a very uncomfortable one. He was forced into the ten-cent house by threatened competition on the right of his location and is forced to keep open his place to the left in order to prevent others from getting a foothold. He is like the man who stood between the devil and the deep sea."

The most remarkable feature in connection with the higher price agitation is the marked silence on the part of the exhibitors. But few seem to give it attention. It was expected that the urging of the proposed increase would bring forth a storm of protests. One motion picture publication, evidently in a spirit of curiosity, has editorially urged exhibitors to express their views. Those who have thus far spoken seem disinclined to have their names used. One of them said: "We all want to raise our admission prices because we know it will lead to better service and better patronage, but the problem is such an intricate one that we think it better to wait until the men higher up get through figuring and give us some practical method for accomplishing it. One thing is certain, if we are to raise prices we must be protected by the exchanges against unfair competition."

* * *

One of the most important recent decisions by courts in connection with the motion picture business is that rendered by Justice Davis, of the Supreme Court of New York. The National Board of Censorship and Commissioner of Licenses Bell refused to license a film depicting war scenes between the German and French governments, although the scenario was written upon a poem based upon imaginary incidents. The objection was that the film might tend to create riot and disorder. In sustaining the contention, the court complimented the National Board of Censors and the Commissioner of Licenses and held that they have jurisdiction where a question of obscenity, immorality or public policy arises in connection with a film. It is the first legal adjudication made on the question of public policy and is an emphatic confirmation of the claim so frequently made by the exhibitors that the New York system of censorship is one that does censor, and amply fills the bill with justice to all concerned.

A STATE MOTION PICTURE LIBRARY.

James L. Gillis, State Librarian of California, is perfecting a plan for making use of motion pictures in the educational work being carried on by the state. He proposes to furnish a state library exhibit at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition at San Francisco and, in addition to the books shown, there will be a series of moving pictures demonstrating the method of distributing these in the rural districts. The farm advisor, a recent addition to the educational staff of the state, visits the agricultural districts advising husbandmen on the work in which they are engaged and distributing books from the State Library. Pictures will be made of the advisor in his official capacity. The State Librarian also proposes to establish a film exchange where schools, clubs, societies and like bodies may obtain industrial films and pictures of educational and scientific value.

"In Search of the House of Fear"

Universal Company Leads a Midnight Expedition to the Wilds of Jersey.

Experienced by Hanford C. Judson.

THIS is no account of a motion picture, but a true story of an adventure and it will relate how Julius Stern, Eastern Studio Manager, and Paul Gulick, manager of the Universal's publicity, took a band of scribes across the Hudson in a horseless hill-climber to see a motion picture made. If the motion picture in question had been any ordinary affair, or even the best work of art that the greatest producer ever conceived, it is more than probable that not one of the scribes would have ventured to such a lonely place at the dim hour of midnight. It wasn't art that drew the reviewers, but mechanics. The picture that we saw is going to be a good one, the Imp Company had Stewart Peyton on the job—he's a genius for wild tales—and Peyton had with him a cast of strong players—four of 'em looked like "cops." But the reason of our going was that the picture was going to be taken out of doors in the darkness, against the brightly lighted windows of a dwelling—a thing not tried successfully before—and was to make clear not merely the outlining of the figures, but their faces—the story depends on the spectator's recognizing the individual faces and seeing the emotions and characters of them.

We met at the Mecca Building. The chauffeur was entrusted with a piece of paper with 50 Edgewater Road written on it and warned by Mr. Stern not to lose it; he didn't. We crossed the river and climbed the hill and went some along the road. Soon there were branches overhead. Dickinson opened the window of the limousine to let the smoke out and the cold night come in. Denig, out in front with his fur collar turned up, saw a light in the distance. The machine came as near as possible to it and it was proposed that Dickinson ask the way; but he wanted a guarantee against the dog. Someone held up a lamp at the window and we learned that we had passed our objective and had to go back. Back a bit there was a road with possibilities both ways. We turned to the left and soon passed three who said they were strangers, but assured us that there wasn't no numbers around there. A bit further at another house we learned that we should have turned to the right. After covering a good bit of the State in the other direction we were told again that our way was straight back with no turning, so back we went and came to a stop between two buildings—one looked like a castle and stood on the left, and toward this Denig and Condon made their way. They hadn't gone far before Julius Stern, looking to the right, noticed a bright light in the distance and recognized the haunted house.

As we drew near the building—it is a little innocent home by day, but lives a double life—was blinking at us with all its eyes. Some natives had crept up and half hidden in the trees were wondering; for the house seemed half-stupid with some fiery liquor that it had been imbibing and would wink a lot of bright light out through one of its windows for a moment and then blinking this would open another. Perhaps something excited it for all at once it sent a smash of light through all its eyes at once. stood fairly pouring out brightness. We went inside where it was like day—the people outside saw our black outlines as we melted into what was like a furnace.

The place was fitted out with plenty of sets of the new Panchrome Twin Arcs, each with its reflector and two bright arc lights which can be used on either direct or alternating current and need only fifteen amperes on a 110-volt circuit. The great value of this outfit is that as many of them as a director needs can be carried along and used, as in this case, in any home where current is to be had. Each set with its rheostat weighs nineteen pounds and can be lifted about—in one scene the electrician took one up a tree to play the role of a full moon. The light they give is very clear and bright. They are made by Allison & Hadaway, 235 Fifth avenue, New York City. John W. Allison soon arrived to see whether his new arc-set was doing all that he hoped.

Stewart Peyton, the director, had a pretty young lady there named Francis Nilson, whom he assured us was an heiress with heart disease and that she had been brought by her villainous uncle, Howard Crampton, to the House of Fear solely to be scared to death. He had the ugliest old hag you ever saw in or out of pictures to keep her and a queer creature with boar's tusks among his teeth was to be seen prowling about the premises. This was a lunatic we were told named Allen Holubar. Paul Gulick says he was loaned to the Imp Company by the warden of Sing Sing for the evening; but we suspect that some one up in 1600 Broadway has a pull with the devil and that the creature didn't come from Sing Sing at all. Mr. Gulick is a strictly truthful man; but—at this point Director Peyton ordered us all outside.

We stood across the road where Eugene Gaudio, the Imp camera man, had placed his instrument. After the director had looked over his house and disposed of one or two of his electricians who wanted to look out of the windows, he shouted, "Come out." The door slowly opened, a flood of light behind it silhouetting the outline of the girl, her piteously disheveled hair falling in long curls around her shoulders, and as quickly closed. The moon, that the electrician had taken up the tree, its light hidden from us by its tin hood, now beamed effulgently on the girl's frightened face. She was fright to her finger tips and greatly appealing as she crept softly across the piazza and darted away to the left; but she wasn't to escape. Now the bright door opened again, and what issued from it will be seen later by spectators on the film and they will also see how the hero (Hobart Henley) of the tale came in time to see the girl taken back through the door, the hag holding it open for them to bring her in, and how he caught Boar's Tusks looking through the window and how he brought the cops.

These scenes were taken and taken again. Twelve solemn notes, by distance mellowed, came from a church tower in the valley. The newspaper men stood in the frozen grass. One found a grape vine and we all skipped rope waiting for the "spread" that had been promised. One remarked, "What the New Jersey are we here so long for" and then Gulick talked turkey. We piled into the limousine of John Allison, the head of Allison & Hadaway, makers of the bright portable lights, and motored to a lager beer saloon about a mile away. It was a joyfully dirty looking place and there were some thoroughly delightful neighborhood characters lounging at the bar or seated at the little tables, half finished beer glasses, cards and blue and white chips around them. The pool table had a rent in it a foot long and the cues lacked tips. The Ladies' Epiphany Circle has an advertisement of a fair on the wall and there is to be a barn dance given by some other charitable association. Under a table lay a St. Bernard dog weighing about 250 pounds, and Mr. Gulick said that it was to be used to help frighten the heroine; but didn't say that it was to be used in "The House of Fear" picture.

There was a big empty dance hall back of the barroom and a table in it set for dinner—fricassee of chicken, fried potatoes, beets, peas, coffee and other things, all very good. Some one put five cents into a sideboard like contraption at one end of the room and it began to bellow a tune. We don't know what the tune was, but the scribe sang "Tipperary" to it. The machine didn't like the song; for it whined and howled all through the next nickel's worth and the host came in and asked if we didn't like the dinner. It ended like the famed party of Hans Brightman and the automobile took us all back to the city. The scribe thinks the pictures will be good, but knows that Paul Gulick is a good entertainer.

BUNNY "ARRESTED" IN DETROIT.

Detroit from November 15 to 21 entertained a real, live picture star in the person of John Bunny. The occasion was a musical comedy attraction with Mr. Bunny in the leading role, which played the Lyceum Theater; so great was the demand for seats that an extra matinee was given on November 19.

During his week's stay in Detroit, Mr. Bunny was the host at many dinners and receptions. Probably the most important one was that given by the Local Union No. 199, Motion Picture Operators' Branch of the I. T. A. S. E. The affair took place at 46 Grand River avenue, where the union makes its headquarters, and started at 11.30 p. m. There was an attendance of over 150 persons, comprising motion picture operators, members of the Bunny company, local theater managers, newspapermen and friends. When Mr. Bunny entered the hall he was surprised by being arrested, the charges against him being that he had come to the peaceful city of Detroit and caused huge multitudes of people to laugh much against their will. He was given a chance to defend himself, but the jury convicted him of "being a good fellow." The penalty was a life membership in the union, and he was presented with a solid gold engraved membership card enclosed in a handsome morocco case; the presentation speech was made by B. Harlan Starr, manager of the New Empire Theater, Detroit.

At the conclusion of the address, Mr. Bunny arose to say a few words in response, but the applause was so deafening and so continuous that it was fully seven minutes before he was able to talk. Remarks during the evening were also made by A. J. Gilligham, proprietor of the Empire, and general manager of the General Film Company's Detroit branch, and Howard O. Pierce, manager of the Washington Theater.

MARY PICKFORD IN "CINDERELLA."

When the Famous Players included in a recent announcement of forthcoming productions, Mary Pickford in a subject entitled, "The Stepsister," they termed it a "genuine surprise." Just how much of a surprise it is, was disclosed only last week, when it was explained that "The Stepsister" is nothing else than a modern and original version of the century-old classic, "Cinderella." The subject is to appear on the Paramount Program December 28, and is described as the Paramount Christmas release.

In the exquisitely fanciful fairy tale, "Cinderella," Mary Pickford portrays the pathetic but bewitching little cinder-girl who was at last rewarded for her virtue and patience by a splendid triumph over her haughty sisters and unkind stepmother, and crowned princess, and sovereign of her true-love's heart. This new version of "Cinderella" is a delightful blend of comedy and pathos, and provides a consummately artistic treat for people of all ages.

NOVEL SCENARIO CONTEST.

Followers of the motion picture screen will be interested in a prize contest about to be started by The New York Dramatic Mirror in collaboration with Thomas A. Edison, Inc. Mark Swan, author of the "Andy Series" and a score of other Edison photoplays, as well as successful plays for the legitimate stage, has written two-thirds of a one-reel photoplay, and The Mirror is offering a prize of $50 for the best completion of the story submitted by a reader, four prizes of $10 each for the next best endings, and a prize of $10 for the most suitable title.

The completed photoplay will be produced by Thomas A. Edison, Inc., with full credit on the screen to the contestant who supplies the prize winning ending. The contest started November 18 and closes January 9, 1915.

Tyrone Power in Selig Productions

Popular Actor of the Stage Will Be Seen in "The Texas Steer" and "The Servant in the House."

TYRONE POWER, whose splendid work in "Aristocracy" has already been noted in the columns of this journal, is under engagement by the Selig company for his appearance in "The Texas Steer" and "The Servant in the House." The productions will be made in the Chicago studios of the company, which are now being devoted entirely to larger subjects. It was here that "Your Girl and Mine," the pretentious suffrage story, was filmed. Giles Warren, who produced the votes for women pictures, also will direct Mr. Power.

Tyrone Power.

Mr. Power was under engagement by Mr. Selig to portray Robert Smith, the Drainman, in "The Servant in the House," when he was asked to look over the part of Brandon in the famous old Hoyt comedy "A Texas Steer." The part so appealed to Mr. Power that Mr. Selig arranged to put on the comedy first, and it is now well under way.

"I like the part of Brandon," said Mr. Power; "it is such a breezy, wholesome, manly part, but I am especially fond of the role of the Drainman. I first appeared in this character at the Savoy Theater in New York in March, 1908. It is a most unusual play, containing a story of three brothers, one an East Indian bishop, one a country parson and one a scavenger. Viewed as a portrayal of actual life "The Servant in the House" is incredible, but viewed as an allegory, blending incidents of domestic drama with religious precept and admonition, it is coherent and comprehensible, and likewise it is morally significant."

The impersonation of Tyrone Power as the Drainman, revealing that vagrant as a wretched father, at first half savage as the result of injustice, unkindness, trouble and grief, then tortured in mental and emotional conflict, and finally as heroic in self-conquest has been described as wonderfully successful. Stalwart in figure, pictorial in aspect, rugged in manner, bold in style, broad in gesture, Mr. Power should make the portrayal on the screen surprisingly graphic. He possesses the ability to vitalize the character. Mr. Power appeared with "The Servant in the House" until the close of the season of 1909-10. Since then he has found seclusion and rest in his cottage near the Richelieu River in Canada.

Included in the cast of "A Texas Steer" are, besides Mr. Power, Grace D'Armond, Frances Bayless, John Charles, Mrs. Tyrone Power, Russell Fulton, Walter Roberts, Ralph Johnson, James West, Frank Weed, Charles Huntington, Elmer Jerome, Isabell Randolph and William Castelatt.

With "The Rosary" being lavishly produced in the big Selig western studios and "The Carpet from Bagdad" complete with an abundance of Oriental splendor and wealth of scene and accessory and a host of other Selig productions in contemplation, we may be sure there are rare treats in store for picture lovers.

DENVER'S MAYOR IN PICTURES.

Dr. Perkins, Mayor of Denver, will be seen in a forthcoming Thanhouser release called "A Denver Romance." The Mayor, who thus appears for the first time on any screen, was not easily inducted into the limelight. When the "Yellowstone" company from the Thanhouser New Rochelle studio was in Denver, an entire picture was taken in that city. Mignon Anderson and Morris Foster, in the scenario, were to be married. Robert S. Ruble, a Denver railroad official, suggested that Mayor Perkins perform the ceremony. He did, but it was only after much coaxing and the final consent by Mr. Ruble, a blushing bachelor, that he would "stand in" as best man. The picture was released November 29.

"The Bargain"

A Seven-Reel Paramount Release Which Reverts to the Old Type of Western Picture.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS is a weird spot on the Paramount program. It is a bold, I might even say a reckless, attempt to revive a style of motion picture which we had hoped was a thing of the past. Old-timers well remember the days when exchanges and newspapers cataloguing films divided them into "Drama," "Comic" and "Western." In 1908 and 1909, and even later, "Western" dominated many programs. Nor will it be denied that in the heyday of the single reel many of these "Westerns" were splendid pictures, often portraying most accurately and most pathetically and most picturesquely the life of the early West. Indeed, the success of the early pictures soon produced an excess of supply over demand and the public became surfeited not to say nauseated with sheriffs, outlaws, bad Indians, good Indians, Mexican villains, heroic outlaws, desperate halfbreeds, etc.

Scene from "The Bargain" (Paramount).

"The Bargain" is nothing more than an old-fashioned "Western." I cannot truthfully say that it is one inch above the average of such pictures. Its scenic background is superbly beautiful, but not more so than that shown in many old single reels. Its plot follows the old familiar lines: the outlaw, finely acted by William S. Hart, robs the stage coach, wounding or killing at least one of the men on the top of the coach, then he steals the money belonging to the express company, and then, still following familiar lines, the bandit falls in love with a good girl. He repents of his robbery and decides to return the stolen money, but the sheriff gets him before he can make restitution.

Here comes a slight departure from conventional lines. While in the old-fashioned pictures the sheriff is a rock of honesty, this officeholder is tainted with a fatal weakness, and, taking the stolen money from the bandit, loses it in the gambling hall. Now comes "The Bargain." The bandit proposes to the sheriff that he "turn him loose," promising in return to get the lost money back. The bandit is as good as his word, holds up a gang of gamblers, gets the money and returns it to the sheriff. The latter, duly grateful, allows the outlaw two hours to reach the "Mexican border." The outlaw escapes happily and something like six felonies committed by two men go entirely unpunished.

It is said that pictures of this sort are still popular in certain sections of the country and that nickelodeons in many big cities still yearn for them. This may be true, but it does not alter the fact that pictures of this sort have in the past been the most dangerous weapon in the hands of our enemies. There can be no doubt whatever that a picture of this kind has a bad influence on youthful minds. I hear it has been passed by the Board of National Censors. If this is true, the board have for the time suspended all the rules so nicely defined in their little pamphlet.

Watterson R. Rothacker

FOUR years ago this month, Mr. Rothacker left the moving picture trade paper field to form the Industrial Moving Picture Company, with Carl Laemmle and R. H. Cochrane. This company has the signal distinction of being the first organiation in the world to specialize in the manufacture and handling of moving pictures exclusively for industrial exploitation, commercial education, advertising and selling. Their record of moving picture advertising achievement includes such notable campaigns as the Du Pont Powder Company, the Postum Cereal Company, the Winchester Repeating Arms Co., the Northern Pacific Railway Company, Imperial Oil Company, Phoenix Horseshoe Co., the H. J. Heinz Company, American Cynanamid Co., United States Brewers' Assn., Peabody Coal Company, United States Gypsum Co., M. Rumely Company, Holt Mfg. Co., Universal Portland Cement Co., International Harvester Co., German Khali Works, Old Taylor Whiskey, General Fireproofing Co., and dozens of others of equal importance. Mr. Rothacker gave personal attention to the production of famous Mr. and Mrs. Vernon Castle dancing pictures, which were featured by Martin Beck over the entire Orpheum Circuit, and has several other successful feature productions to his credit. About a year ago, because Carl Laemmle's duties as president of the Universal Film Mfg. Co. required his undivided attention, Mr. Rothacker was able to purchase Mr. Laemmle's stock holdings in the Industrial Moving Picture Co., and at that time succeeded Mr. Laemmle as president of that concern. The Industrial Moving Picture Company have in Chicago the largest factory in the world devoted to the manufacture of advertising moving pictures and there maintain their general offices and a special bureau for moving picture advertising service. Mr. Rothacker is the pioneer moving picture advertisting specialist, and even as far back as eight years ago his articles on this subject were published in film and advertising journals in this country and abroad. Mr. Rothacker is a member of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, the Hamilton Club, the Aero Club of Chicago, the American Association of Commercial Executives, is one of the Governors of the Reel Fellows Club of Chicago, and for two terms served on the Ways and Means Committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce.

ONE MAN'S OPINION OF "LENA RIVERS."

Fred C. Amer, of the Royal Feature Film Company, Columbus, Ohio, volunteers this information and these are his exact words in a letter written to the Cosmos Feature Film Corporation: "Beulah Poynter in 'Lena Rivers' is great and the film is meeting with general approval." This is but one of many testimonials, all of which express the same sentriments regarding "Lena Rivers."

LIFE PHOTO TO PRODUCE "THE AVALANCHE."

The Life-Photo Film Corporation announces that it has purchased the photoplay rights to "The Avalanche." It has bought the world's rights to this former Broadway success. The owners of the play and the authors are Robert Hilliard and W. A. Tremayne. After its Broadway run, "The Avalanche" toured the country.

"The Avalanche" deals with the attempts of a woman to wreck a man through financial manipulations of the mining stock, Avalanche. Before the man's marriage he and the woman were engaged. His marriage, however, to another woman arouses the hatred of the central feminine figure in the play.

"The Lady of Lyons"

Five-Reel Sawyer Incorporated Picture of Lytton's Sardonic Comedy Makes Interesting Offering.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

AS a play, "The Lady of Lyons" falls into the class of productions so well known that everyone ought to know about them, but with which few are well acquainted, at least of the generation that counts most today. If one cannot see the play, the next best thing is to see the picture. The picture as an offering of entertainment to the public rises, on its own merits, above the average, certainly, though it doesn't reach the top rank where it would give spectators a sense of human life apart from the "boards." Lest this be taken as harsh criticism let us hurriedly add that this reviewer has yet to see a picture of a play, and he has seen some fine ones, that was not stagey, at least in the awkward juxtaposition of characters due to stage limitations. This offering is a very good picture of an excellent play; but is not a great motion picture.

The picture makes its story clear. We are introduced to the ill-bred, but proud young miss who flouts all her lovers because, if they happen to be rich, they are not noble. We find that of two of these, both despised, one is very rich and the other a painter and a gardener's son—this latter youth she has never noticed enough to recognize him again. The rich man whom she has spurned fits-out the love-lorn gardener's son to pay suit to the girl again in silks and gems loaned for the purpose and as the gallant Prince of Como. Accepting this situation, which is convincing enough, the action follows naturally. The construction of the play doesn't show a great mind, but it is all human and is enlivened with humor which, if not wholly spontaneous, is not strained.

The players are, for the most part, from the great Parisian theaters and have earned recognition in France. There is one character that is wholly satisfying, that of the fire-eating colonel who, in the early part of the story, suspects that the Prince of Como is an impostor—he fights a duel hoping to get rid of him, but is worsted—and at the close, after the gardener's son has won a true title in the Napoleonic wars, helps him win back the bride whom he loves still, but had so cruelly deceived. The actress who takes the role of the girl does well enough, as does the young lover. The girl's mother is another character which should be especially commended. The sets and backgrounds—it was made in France—serve excellently and have been brought out clearly by the camera.

LARRY TRIMBLE WILL "DEPOSE."

The testimony of Larry Trimble, former director of the Vitagraph Company, is sought to throw light on the issues involved in an infringement action brought in the United States District Court against the film company by Jerome K. Jerome, who claims that the photo play entitled "Professor Optimo" constitutes an infringement of his work which was produced on the stage as "The Passing of the Third Floor Back."

Judge Hand has signed an order directing the American Consul at London, where Mr. Trimble is now residing, to take the deposition of the witness. Walter W. Irwin, counsel for the film company, says Mr. Trimble had charge of producing the photoplay and is familiar with the origin and development of the plot and theme of the production.

Alan Hale, Biograph

WHEN a man is happily situated as a leading man in one of the oldest and best motion picture companies, is doing excellent work and in every way appears to think life worth living, it ill becomes any of his friends to find fault with his choice of a lifework. There is one, however, and that is this writer, who, from the first time he met Alan Hale, has always had the feeling that the tall blond young leading man of the Biograph should be dragged into court and compelled to show cause why he should not have been a lawyer instead of an actor. This statement is in no measure in derogation of his histrionic ability; it is inspired by the belief that a remarkable command of good language, a fine selective pick from a wide vocabulary, marked capacity for stating his own side of a case and picking the weak points in an opponent's — these and associated qualifications would make Alan Hale a pleader away out of the ordinary. However, if Alan Hale were of the bar instead of the screen the men of the Screen Club would miss many a controversial treat.

Alan Hale.

Mr. Hale's stage work began six years ago as Dr. Chapman in "The Message from Mars," with the Orpheum stock company in Philadelphia. He had asked the director for a chance, and that functionary, after looking over the young man, said he guessed he would take a chance. Mr. Hale made good. He had previously studied osteopathy, but he found playing the doctor so much more congenial than becoming the professional article that he then and there made up his mind to stick to the stage. At the termination of his Orpheum engagement he was for several seasons in stock and also did vaudeville and concert work—he is a singer and has studied music.

Mr. Hale's first picture work was with the Lubin Company, where he remained nearly a year. Then he came to New York, and after a season with the Reliance Company, joined the Biograph, where he has been for nearly two years. With the latter company he has played many parts. Recently he has been seen in the leading characters of "Martin Chuzzlewit," "The Cricket on the Hearth," "Scrap of Paper," "Earnest Maltravers" and "Masks and Faces," all two-reel subjects and unusually successful. Mr. Hale is one of the most likable members of the Screen Club, and that's a likable bunch. In his leisure moments he is always ready to wage war around the pool tables, where he plays a steady game, or to take part in forensic combats if there be any weighty public question to be thrashed out.

In private life Mr. Hale is the husband of Gretchen Hartman, an actress of ability, who plays with him in many opposite leads. One of her pronounced recent successes was as Peg Woffington in "Masks and Faces."

HE SPOKE TO LORD ROBERTS.

James Young claims distinction in having been the first person to speak to Lord Roberts upon his return to England from his victories in South Africa back in 1901. At the same time Mr. Young took a number of snap shot photos of his Lordship and Lady Roberts. The recent death of Lord Roberts on the fighting line of the Allies in France awakens some interest in this incident to which Mr. Young now reverts with pride.

DELLA CONNOR WITH GEORGE KLEINE.

Della Connor, identified with the Pathe forces as a leading woman until recently, is playing the part of Sadie Small in George Kleine's "Officer 666," just completed at the George Kleine Studio, 11 East 14th street, New York City. Miss Connor is both well known and popular and her splendid work has caused her to be retained to play "Joan" in "Stop Thief."

"The Stolen Birthright"

A Modern Comedy of Errors in Which Two Girls Look Alike and Cause Misunderstanding.—Three-Reel Pathe-Wharton.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

EAST and west furnish the backgrounds for this story. It begins in the east. Two sisters are separated as babies and neither even knows that she has a sister. It is a situation that will appeal as plausible or not, according to the spectator's temperament. But there will be few indeed whose attention will not be arrested by the opening situation. A poor farmer is evicted for not paying his rent. It is just after his first child is born. The deputy sheriff sees the poor wife going mad and stays his work: but the trouble is done. The young mother, when left alone, hides her child to keep it from being taken with the furniture and, in the bureau drawer, it smothers. The farmer is just about to bury it when a baby carriage with twins in comes tumbling over the cliff—we have seen how this happened, how the carriage got started due to the carelessness of the nurse, and how it rolled over the lip of the cliff. The farmer substitutes his own dead child for one of the twins, neither of whom is harmed. So the sisters are separated.

In a few years the farmer goes west and takes his one of the sisters. The picture ten years later shows her as a barmaid in a cowboy tavern. She is loved by a gambler and tells him that he must live for a year in a city and be honest before she will marry him. The other sister is a married woman. The gambler in the east sees her and thinks she is his girl. He won't believe that she is not and so acts that the husband gets jealous and orders her out of his house—she had been his stenographer and he didn't know much about her past. As the story draws toward its happy ending, there are several perfectly made double exposures.

The picture has some striking incidents. It is ably acted and many of its scenes make very pretty pictures. In quality it is not quite up to Wharton's average, which is high; but it makes a good, interesting offering.

BOSWORTH FILMING VAN LOAN STORY.

The first moving picture company to go to Banning, California, took possession last week, and the town is theirs. Hobart Bosworth and a company of twenty-five are putting on some lively Western scenes for the opening reel of Charles E. Van Loan's "Message to Buckshot John," and everyone in town is taking a great interest. For the big scene of the capture of the Bad Jake Kennedy gang, who "shot up" the town of "Clayton," the entire town of Banning turned out. School was dismissed, stores deserted, and when "Kennedy," "Buckshot John" and their followers tore along Main street the citizens entered into the spirit of the play with great enthusiasm and helped to make the scene remarkably realistic.

"FALSE COLORS" COMPLETED.

The Smalleys have completed "False Colors," a four-reel story of theatrical life, and will begin Monday on "Sunshine Molly," an exciting story of the oil well country written by Mrs. Smalley (Lois Weber). Mr. Smalley will direct the production and he and Mrs. Smalley will play the leads.

The entire company will be taken to Midway, California, the center of the oil well region.

New Edison Studio Building.

The alterations and additions to the Edison Studio in the Bronx, made necessary by the fire of a few months ago, are now completed. On the site where the frame building which consisted of directors officers and projecting room once stood, has been erected a new four-story concrete structure. On the second floor is the costume department, where every conceivable costume from that of messenger boy to king may be had. There is a private entrance for the "extras" direct from the street to the dressing rooms, thus eliminating the necessity of their passing through the studio proper and interfering with the regular routine. On the ground floor is the kitchen, presided over by a chef, who supplies luncheon to all desirous of remaining in the studio during the noon hour. Aside from the dressing rooms in the main building, four large and completely appointed dressing rooms are for use by the regular staff artists. A section of this new structure consists of a suite of ten offices for the sole use of directors and stage managers.

These much-needed changes will greatly improve conditions for all concerned, and will greatly facilitate the making of new pictures.

"The Last Dance."

Five Reels. Picture Play House Co.

THIS feature deals with the infatuation of a young artist who has fallen in love with a celebrated dancer. The theme is well and delicately handled and full of dramatic power and intensity. The acting no less than the personality of the leading characters are far above the average.

Scene from "The Last Dance" (Picture Playhouse).

The photography is good throughout and the settings, both interior and exterior, leave nothing to be desired. The ending is tragic. The lovers, who are both talented artists with genuine artistic temperaments, struggle with conflicting emotions, dividing their allegiance between art and love. In the end the artist dies of grief and the dancer follows him into the great beyond.

"The Walls of Jericho"

A Five-Reel Picture of Alfred Sutro's Melodrama of American Mining Country and English Society—Features Walter Hitchcock.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE author of this play got his title in a Biblical quotation suggested by the story's climax at which time the worldly walls of selfishness and frivolity built up around a society woman fall flat at the spiritual call of her motherhood. It is just as the heathen walls of Jericho fell when the spiritual music of Hebrew trumpets sounded around them and the quotation, appearing again in an explanatory subtitle, deepens by its apt illustration, the spectator's impression of what takes place in the woman's soul.

The picture's story skillfully prepares for and works up to this change of heart in its heroine. Alfred Sutro is no novice in portraying deep human experiences and his faculty is well illustrated in this play. He is no great dramatist; the experiences of his characters, while convincing, are exceptional and not typical. Everybody suffers, though few of us are wrongly accused of murder. Murder is almost nothing but a stage property. But accept this; there is plenty to be thankful for in the picture which takes high rank among melodramatic offerings through the human value of its subject matter, the character drawing of its players and, to a lesser extent, the smooth staging of its story which is always kept clear and nearly always made to seem natural.

Just before the climax of the story, set in England, the woman has let herself fall in love with a society rake; she is losing large sums at bridge and is wholly neglecting her child and her husband. The rake has been told that the police in America want the husband for murder. The opening scenes have shown who the real culprit is and how he seemed able to fasten the blame on the story's hero and it is he who tells the rake of the damaging fact. Neither the murderer nor the hero nor the spectators know as yet that the victim came-to before he died and left his account. The rake wanting the woman, sends to the American sheriff to come for his man. The sheriff appears and the rake sets a time for him to call at the house of the woman and her husband. A few minutes before the time, he takes the murderer-tattler there and then the sheriff comes. The husband and the wife both think for a moment that a terrible calamity is about to fall upon them and this is the emotional climax that tears through the woman's soul and makes her change of heart convincing. The scene—the way the characters stand in it—is stagey; but the inner spirit of the moment is true and human.

Clair Whitney, who plays the women, had a similar but much harder role in "The Woman of Mystery," by Wilkie Collins, that Madame Blache produced. She carries the part very well. It was a simple matter for Stewart Holmes to fill the role of society villain perfectly—he has had more difficult roles. Walter Hitchcock plays the role of the murdered man with distinction. It is a short but good part. The hero of the story is clearly and naturally acted by Edward Breece and the murderer is as well taken by Edward Jose. The scenario was prepared by Anthony Kelly. The story, swinging as it does from the wilds of the American west to England and with a cut-back to America at the climax, has a breadth that carries it away from stage suggestions and Mr. Kelly has skillfully added to its freedom. Some of its scenes are cramped, but it is a good bit of picture writing.

Charles Simone

ONE of the "big little" men of the motion picture industry with a record of several years' standing is Charles Simone, who is rounding out an impressive career by directing pictures at David Horsley's big Centaur plant in Bayonne, N. J. Mr. Simone recently finished a spectacular five-reel production of the Verdi opera "Il Trovatore," which cost more than $30,000, and is now going ahead putting on other pictures.

Charles Simone.

Charles Simone was born in Castellana, Italy, on November 18, 1874. After finishing school he studied for a while for the ministry and then came to America when only fourteen years old. The next few years were spent in the theatrical profession, both as author and actor. At nineteen he married Rosabel Metzler. The next two years were spent as a journalist.

About six years ago "Charlie," as he is best known, entered the motion picture business. Then, as now, he was associated with David Horsley. Back in the days before the Motion Picture Distribution and Sales Company, Charlie was advertising and publicity manager of the Nestor Film Company. Then he became general manager and during his incumbency a large brick plant was erected at Bayonne, N. J., and studios were established at Hollywood, Cal.

In the days of the Sales Company Mr. Simone was a member of the board of directors. When the Universal was formed Charlie established a poster and photo department and later "cleaned house" in the scenario department. For a while he was manager of sales and advertising of Venus Features, now out of existence. When the Centaur Film Company, the oldest independent concern in America, was revived through the construction of a large plant in Bayonne, N. J., Mr. Simone returned to the manufacturer with whom he was first connected.

Surely Charles Simone, who escaped becoming a priest, only to enter the motion picture business, where he can fill almost any role, is a versatile chap.

HERO WORSHIP AND MISTAKEN IDENTITY.

A little incident occurred in San Francisco which emphasizes the popularity of Maciste, the great Nubian giant, in Cabiria. A big negro planted himself in front of one of the Cabiria lithographs, showing Maciste, when a number of small boys gathered around and noticing a very striking resemblance between the negro and his prototype Maciste, one of the kids whispered to his companions, "That's him." "Yes, yes, that's him," the boys chorused. The negro looked around, smiled, looked again at Maciste and with a gleam of satisfaction in his eyes, threw out his chest and walked on. The crowd followed. Now every time the negro shows himself in public he is followed by an admiring crowd.

KLEINE'S "THE NAKED TRUTH" BREAKS RECORD.

George Kleine's beautiful five-part subject, "The Naked Truth," featuring Lyda Borelli, broke the Kleine record last week when it played its 70th engagement in the Chicago city limits. There are only two hundred theaters in Chicago with a seating capacity exceeding three hundred, which makes the record remarkable when the ratio of houses "killed" by a single engagement in a given neighborhood is considered. The Bijou Dream, adjoining the big Orpheum on State street, is playing an eight-day engagement with "The Naked Truth" and bookings continue to pour in steadily.

"The Circus Man"

Rambling Story with Lots of Heart-Interest Gives Five-Reel Lasky Offering Probable Popularity.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THIS story is from the novel of George Barr McCutcheon, "The Rose in the Ring." It should be a popular picture, in spite of its few drawbacks, which are swamped by its excellences. It opens with a parricide, for which the hero is wrongly accused and has to flee for his life. He joins a circus and falls in love with the circus man's daughter. There is an interesting pickpocket character in it who is the means of clearing him and reinstating him in his inheritance.

There are many characters and two or three minor stories are twisted into the main thread; but all are interesting and to one who can keep a clear-cut memory of faces all will be as clear as one could wish. It is not dramatic; but is filled with dramatic moments that often make a strong appeal to heart sentiments. The director is Oscar Apfel, and in much of it he shows his power at its best. Let us point out this one bad bit of directing—when Frank Jenison (Huburt Whitehead) comes to the cellar where his wrongly accused nephew has been left guarded, he almost steps on the unconscious guard, although it is broad-daylight—he seems to be talking about the crops or something. But then, how many dramatically telling scenes there are! It is not a picture to be spoiled by one or two lapses.

There is not one weak player in all the cast. Joe Mullally plays the wrongly accused nephew, a juvenile part, and opposite to him is Florence Dagmar as the circus-man's daughter. Big Theodore Roberts makes a very convincing appeal as the circus-man. Mabel Van Buren plays his wife, and these two with the Cronks, played by Raymond Hatton in the role of Ernie the half-wit (a fine bit of work) and by Howard Hickman as his elder brother. Colonel Grand, who has taken a fancy to the circus-man's wife, and who is killed in his villainy by Ernie, the half-wit, is ably presented by Fred Montague. Billy Elmer has the role of Isaac, the negro lawyer. The mechanical work has been very ably done. There is nothing high-brow about the offering; it tells a story in which there are many good things.

KLEINE ENGAGES MARY RYAN FOR "STOP THIEF."

Mary Ryan, one of the best known leading women in America, has been engaged by George Kleine to play the lead of the maid in "Stop Thief," the famous Cohan & Harris comedy which is being filmed by the Kleine forces following the completion of "Officer 666." Mary Ryan is at present starring in "On Trial," the big hit now playing at the New Candler Theater, New York. In addition to her popularity in the east, Miss Ryan counts a host of western friends. She is well remembered as one of those who made famous the old Dearborn Stock Company, Chicago, playing at what is now the Garrick Theater.

MORE FILMS LOST.

The Minneapolis branch of the Laemmle Film Service reports the loss of the following subjects: "Their Honeymoon," Nestor; "The Test," Nestor; "Our Daughter," Eclair; "Discord and Harmony," Bison. It is believed that the pictures in question were stolen from the American Express Company on November 7. Information regarding them will be appreciated by J. V. Bryson, manager of the Minneapolis office.

Vitagraph Theater Program

Presenting "The Mysterious Mr. Davey," "The Man Behind the Door," "The Methods of Margaret" and "The Sage Brush Gal."

Reviews by Louis Reeves Harrison.

BEGINNING with the last named of this formidable array ray of "Thes," "The Sage Brush Gal," it does not contain enough material for so long a play. Its redemption lies in some bright characterization by the principals. "The Methods of Margaret" is pleasing. As destitute of suspense as it is of pretense, one knows what is to happen, yet it happens so delightfully that there is no need of being particular. The ladies shine, particularly Lillian (not Lily, if you please) Walker, and again, Lillian Burns. The story is one of retaliation. The wife feels humiliated by her husband's rather familiar relations with gushing typists in his office and teaches him a lesson by engaging some gushing male employees in her household.

More ambitious is "The Man Behind the Door," announced as a "comedy in four parts." Wally Van in the leading role might have participated in the adventures which make up the body of the story, but he is merely an unwilling spectator of what goes on, having been locked up in one of the rooms, and viewing the action through keyhole and transom, in the bachelor apartments of a New York man of wealth. It is farce comedy, merely a stringing together of amusing incidents, but it brings out other talents than those of versatile Wally Van. Nita Frazer vies with ever-bewitching Cissy Fitzgerald in roles that call for other charms than those purely spiritual, especially when they lead in a magnificent masque ball scene. What that scene bequeaths to an audience, its legacy, will make a decided impression wherever shown.

An intervening view of the Bay of Naples, a still picture treated with varied atmospheric effects by artistic lighting, is sweet to the eye.

Sidney Drew scores the success of the evening in "The Mysterious Mr. Davey." He is improving in more than one respect, dispensing with crude slap-stick methods and portraying character by refined methods. The comedy is a real one, well constructed, but it is formulated out of simple materials. Drew portrays a married man afflicted with a suspicious wife, who finds relief in the society of a former sweetheart. To cover his escapades with her, he invents a fictitious Mr. Davey, a lonesome old fellow in need of company, and sends letters and telephones to himself from the mysterious Mr. Davey. Even when his wife is on the verge of discovery and insists on meeting the gentleman who needs so much consoling, the wayward husband is not without resources. Drew's acting, the clever subtitles, and an amusing office boy kept the audience laughing as one likes to hear them laugh, not because they are expected to, but because they can't help it. The program is a success through its comedies.

MADE-IN-AMERICA DAY IS POPULAR.

Indorsements of the plan to bring about the establishment of a Made-in-America Day by invoking a most potent force of the day in attracting attention to such a movement, namely, motion picture photography, have been received by the prime movers in the enterprise.

Indications are that the movement, already well started, will continue to gain momentum, and it surely will be a matter of pleasant retrospect, once the plan is consummated, for motion picture interests in general, that men prominently connected with their industry were the originators and propelling forces of this movement.

As stated in the previous issue of this publication, the idea to establish a Made-in-America Day involves the manufacturing of a monster serial film to be entitled "America," which is to be released in weekly installments to leading motion picture theaters throughout the country. This method of calling attention to the resources of the country is to be supplemented by newspaper publicity and public receptions to be accorded under the aegis of local chambers of commerce to a cultured and attractive young woman to be known as the Maid of America, who will address women's organizations in the various centers visited and at the same time figure as a leading figure in the filming activities, supported by a select company of players.

The expedition having in charge this work will be under the personal direction of J. Arthur Nelson, president of the United States Film Corporation. Corporations, whose capital aggregates $100,000,000, have swung into the line behind the Made-in-America Day banner bearers. Of this ten million represents capital invested in the motion picture industry.

"Called Back"

London Film's Four-Part Adaptation of Conway's Novel a Story of Unusual Strength.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

CONTINUOUS suspense characterizes the adaptation by the London Film Company of Hugh Conway's well-known novel "Called Back," which is being released in this country through Cosmofotofilm. George Loane Tucker, who directed the four-part subject, by his work in this picture will strengthen a reputation for careful and craftsmanlike production. He has garbed his characters in the period of Garibaldi, he has constructed his interiors with regard for his times; for his exteriors he has drawn on the hedges, the lawns, the streams and the picturesque structures of Old England. Mr. Tucker has been fortunate or wise as you will in the selection of his cast. It is one that throughout shows capacity and judgment in the delineation of strong dramatic situations, and of these there is an abundance.

Chief among the players is Miss Jane Gail, who has the role of Pauline, the young woman despoiled of her fortune by an uncle who banked too strongly on a revolution coming the way he and his associates desired. The character of Pauline affords Miss Gail a great opportunity to display her art. Her portrayal of the girl who loses her mind following the sight of a brother murdered is marked by high intelligence. We see her as a happy young woman changed to an unemotionless creature, the only variation from the imperturbable placidity of the demented being a tendency at times to hysteria; we see her passing through the stages of countershock which bring back to her the reason that had been dethroned. It is a great opportunity and a great performance.

Henry Ainley in the part of Vaughan contributes his full share to the forcefulness of the story, which he enters as a blind man. His interpretation of the sightless man is convincing and pathetic; and it compels sympathy, as does all of his subsequent work. His conception of the role is deserving of high praise. Charles Rock as Macari, the traitor, is strong and fully adequate. So, also, are those who sustain the roles of Dr. Ceneri and Petroff.

We will not attempt to enumerate the many situations that thrill and stir. There are the entrance of the blind man into the room where the brother has been murdered, the meeting of Vaughan and Pauline and his infatuation, the discovery by Vaughan that his wife is not in possession of her mental faculties, the encounter of the husband with Marcari, in which the Italian flashes a knife and sets at work Pauline's memory, the scenes in the old house where the murder was committed, the gradual recognition by Vaughan of the spot, and his confirming it by playing the same familiar tune on the piano; the incidents in the Siberian convict camp, where Dr. Ceneri tells Vaughan the whole story, and the closing scenes, including the duel between Petroff and Macari and the reunion of husband and wife.

"Called Back" is a picture of unusual strength.

"For Home and Country."

The Cosmofotofilm Company is now booking a two-part subject, "For Home and Country," from the studios of the London Film Company and produced by Harold Shaw. The subject is described by the Censorship Board as a "neutral war picture." The picture contains so many stirring scenes of smashing cavalry and artillery riding, of marching troops, of squadrons of steaming warships that it has value independent of its dramatic side. "For Home and Country" is unquestionably a film designed to aid recruiting in England. In watching the working out of the story, which is of a country invaded, one cannot help feeling England is the land assailed. Spies report to the Secret Service of the invading power and the war council of that power decides, according to a subtitle, "Let Tomorrow Be The Day." An exhibitor knowing the inclinations of his clientele would be well advised as a measure of extreme precaution were he to take a squint at the picture before showing it. There is much in it to commend it.

The story is of a clergyman opposed to war who refuses to permit his daughter to marry a man who follows a martial calling. Later, when the invasion comes and the town is burned and he is personally assailed he changes his mind and enlists. He loses an arm in the conflict, but at the conclusion he sanctions the marriage of his daughter to the captain in the flying corps.

There is one aviation scene that is unique. It is a photograph taken from aeroplane, showing the landscape, with a second aeroplane directly below passing across the field of the camera. The battle scenes are well staged. So, too, the views of the manoeuvers are of much interest.

"The Trail Breakers"

A Railroad and Indian Melodrama in Two Reels, Produced by Henry McRae for the Bison Company.

THE closing situation of this two-reel melodrama will excite enthusiasm. The Indians—they had been working on the railroad, but had been fired, all the tribe and its foreman, for drunkenness—capture a train and there's a running fight. The white railroad workers are on horseback and, shooting as they gallop, they pick off the reds, some of whom fall from the moving flat-car into the ditch. At the end, when the brave chief engineer jumps to the engine cab from his galloping horse, and after a struggle with the most troublesome Indian of all, brings the train to a full stop, the remaining reds tumble out of the passenger car windows, like rats. There is action in all this and excitement; indeed, it is a new kind of thrill and it will most certainly be warmly welcomed by spectators. But the early city scenes of the picture and its love-making are far below this part of the story, both in action and in general sensibleness.

If Director McRae has a peer making out-door thrilling pictures, we can't at this moment recall him. Vigor and punch are to him as natural and inevitable, so it would seem, as breathing. But in very truth, he has no reason to be satisfied with his work as a maker of society scenes, and in tender scenes he is distressing. Now, we say it thus plainly; because it is clearly written in his work that his sole fault is lack of restraint and he can overcome it. He is so fond of the punch that he tries to get it even in a tender love scene where God didn't put it. His lovers will kiss—kissing makes spectators sick—even with a lot of workmen staring them out of face. He ought to make his lovers a bit more shamefaced, which is something no one need be ashamed of.

ENTERING a rich field of political drama, "The City of Darkness" treats the struggle for political place and its perils, with some startling effects made realistic, and therefore more powerful, by utilization of scenes never adequately shown on the stage. The story contains a tense situation, one that it would have been possible to develop on a much larger scale, and there is a principle of natural justice involved. It is almost a pity that so good a plot should be contracted inasmuch as many are attenuated to the breaking point, particularly as characterization could not receive the attention it deserved with such limitations.

The story is one of moral responsibility. A successful gubernatorial candidate, formerly a district attorney, has incurred the deadly enmity of a ward boss by sending his son to execution for a crime. The ward boss sees his chance for revenge when he chances to be present at the murder of a girl engaged to the Governor's brother. The crime is really committed by an unsuccessful suitor, but circumstances point to the Governor's brother as the murderer, and the ward boss puts himself in the situation of a witness for the prosecution. He gives false testimony at the trial and the Governor's brother is found guilty of murder in the first degree. He is sentenced to death and is to be executed at midnight. Telephone communication with the prison at the hour of execution is cut off to prevent a flood of morbid messages.

Such is the situation when the Governor is importuned by his mother and his sister to pardon the young man. He refuses on ethical grounds, but he passes through a period of mental agony after their departure. While in this condition he is visited by the ward boss. The latter gloats on the Governor's sufferings and adds to them by confessing that the boy is innocent. A terrible struggle between the men follows, and the ward boss is left unconscious, while the Governor tries to prevent the electrocution of his unfortunate brother.

The innocent man is shown making his final preparations for death, while the Governor is speeding to a form of rescue that has suggested itself to his acute intelligence. The boy is led into the death chamber and placed in the chair. The Governor dashes into a tremendous building filled with machinery—it is possible to shut off the power that lights the city and furnishes a current to the place of execution. The current is shut off and views are flashed of varied action in high and low society as the whole city is plunged into darkness. The boy is saved and justice done in the end. It is melodrama of a kind superior to the average, and with amplification, with characterization, the story might well be classified with the best form of intense drama.

Samuel Spedon, Advertising Expert

ONE doesn't often need to look far to find a "publicity man." One of them might even come in off the street and ask for a job. But we are not talking just now of this kind of a man. They are many, they are usually inexperienced and are going through the process of being weeded out. And we are going to talk at first less about Mr. Spedon, who is an advertising expert and the special representative of the Vitagraph Company of America, than about Mr. Spedon's kind. What is the true place of such a man in the business and what is it that differentiates him from any man who might take a publicity job, write good copy for advertisements and "run" the publicity office?

Samuel Spedon.

The difference, to answer the latter question first, lies in the quality in that word "run." What he does and how he does it makes him. His rightful place in the business is first assistant to the company's executive department. No company that has nothing to sell needs an advertising man; he is and must be the company's first and wisest salesman. He must know all that any of its salesmen know, or be unworthy of his title. He is also far more than this. In most companies that are bucking competition, he is the most important purchasing agent; for the company buys nothing so hard to estimate the real value of as advertising. It is only because advertising is so necessary to modern business that so much of it is merely "gold brick." The advertising man has nothing to do with the company's discipline or organization; but he is the president's right-hand outside the gate, that is shaking the hands of the company's friends. All these things require him to know the business as no other man, who is not a general officer, knows it. The motion picture business is not only the third biggest business in the world, but it is the most complicated of them all. It changes so fast that no one can "know" it. It is a big thing to hold an important post in such a business. Such a man is rightly a big man.

To come back to the concrete, when "Sam" Spedon shakes hands, the Vitagraph Company shakes hands, and the result is put down to the Vitagraph's credit. He creates good will by his smile, by how he shakes hands, by what he says and much by what he writes, and this is only the beginning of his possibilities. The company's attitude toward and place in what may be termed the social activities of the business—the balls, entertainments and the like of the different organizations that are everywhere and of all kinds—is a very important part of a publicity man's work. This includes the use of the personal popularity of the company's players and it must often be a hard question as to whether it will pay the company to persuade one of its players to attend or not a boresome dance somewhere.

The writer recently had the pleasure of spending a whole day at the Vitagraph office with Mr. Spedon, and these paragraphs grew out of a little talk about his work leading up from some questions asked. It is always interesting to get down to a man's philosophy. We had been talking of temperament, of actors and of sensitive people. "Things will happen," I said. "Yes," said Mr. Spedon; "but when they do, instead of letting my mind dwell on them, I light a pipe and think it all over and find that it isn't that way at all." That led to talk about getting along with different people. "Work with others and they will work with you," said he. "I'm here," he added, "to work for the Vitagraph Company, the officers and the office boys. If one prospers, we all will, and there's not a person in this company that I'm not glad to work for. Clear-cut, optimistic ways of looking at things, is part of the reason why "Sam" Spedon is of big caliber and of some real use in the world.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

"THE LURE O' THE WINDIGO" (Selig).

In the Selig two-reel drama of the north woods, entitled "The Lure o' the Windigo," Maibelle Heikes Justice has introduced a theme depicting with admirable fidelity the unquenchable spirit of revenge in the heart of the Indian. She has written a scenario which tells the simple story of the old, old tragedy in a woman's life and the penalty paid for her betrayal by the scoundrel who won her love, only to cast it aside.

The scenic effects show the towering pines in the great north woods, and Indian characters are introduced to add realism.

The story is of the reckless and promiscuous love-making of a member of the Mounted Police, who is finally trapped through Indian cunning and ingenuity into the payment of a tragic penalty for his wrong-doing. The crafty redman wreaks his own revenge by inciting the rage of those who love the innocent girl who has been made another victim.

The outdoors' photography is superb, showing limitless forests with the people of the woods, and the person seeing the picture can readily imagine that when the tops of the tall pines bend and sway in the wind, they can hear the "voice of the spirit of the wind" (the Windigo) giving a message. The superstitions of the north woods Indians in connection with the "voice of the Windigo" furnish an unusual and most interesting subject for this Selig production. It will be released Monday, December 14.

The production of the picture was directed by F. J. Grandon. Edith Johnson is featured as "Annette Le Clerq," daughter of an old woodsman.

FOX ENGAGES CLAIRE WHITNEY.

Claire Whitney has been engaged by William Fox to appear in support of Robert Edeson in "The Girl I Left Behind Me," which will be placed in rehearsal the latter part of December, and released through The Wonderful Play and Players' Corporation. The role is an ideal one and will afford vast scope for Miss Whitney to display her versatility. "The Girl I Left Behind Me" is the work of David Belasco, and was originally presented by Charles Frohman with great success in the early Empire Theater days. The story of the piece is ideal for film purposes, and will be in five parts. The staging of the photoplay has been entrusted to Lloyd B. Carleton, formerly of the Lubin producing staff. The big scene in the piece is an Indian uprising, and already negotiations are pending with the Government for the use of a reservation, thereby injecting both realism and local color into the scene, through the appearance on the screen of real Indians in full war regalia.

"THE BATTLE OF LOVE" (Essanay).

"The Battle of Love," Essanay's next complete prize mystery drama, released December 19, presents a new phase of the triangular love tangle, but of a wholesome type. It is two women and a man in this case and all the parties are unmarried. The girl who interferes in the real love affair and manages to break it up by causing a misunderstanding, turns around when she sees what she has done, repressed her own love for the love of the man who she discovers loves the other girl only, and brings about their reunion. They are married and everything ends happily. The girl who sacrifices her own love finds a certain happiness in her renunciation and a surcease from sorrow in her art.

DAVID HORSLEY SENDS PRODUCING FORCES TO COAST.

On Wednesday, November 18, David Horsley sent three directors and forty members of his producing forces to Los Angeles, where they will resume their work in the new studios which Mr. Horsley is building in that city.

Milton H. Fahrney, long associated with Mr. Horsley, and his talented wife headed the list of migrants, which included Harry La Pearl, the famous pantomimist, camera men, scenic artists, property men and principal actors.

The Bayonne factory will continue to work at top speed without interruption. David Horsley expects to leave with his family for Los Angeles before the end of the month.

"A BELIEVER IN DREAMS" (Lubin).

George Terwilliger has told a pretty and romantic story which he calles "A Believer in Dreams." A love-sick girl is well mated and content until she happens to hear a grand opera barytone sing and her romantic heart goes out to him, especially as he cast all of the roses he has been presented with at her feet and kisses her dainty hand. Then she dreams that a masked troubador sings to her the same sweet song and thrills her, but when she commands him to uncover his face she sees her old love and begs him to repeat the vows so often heard before. The dream restores her good sense and she welcomes the fealty her temporary impulse had come so near to wrecking. Beautiful Ormi Hawley is fairly starred in the Romance and supported by a talented selection of the Lubin famous players. The scenic mounting and costumes are unusually brilliant.

MANNING WITH ALL-STAR RENTAL CO.

Frank Manning, better known among exhibitors as the Mirror Screen man, has become booking manager for the All-Star Rental Company of 110 West 40th street, New York. He will continue to handle the Mirror Screen.

"FATE'S TANGLED THREADS" (Lubin).

This chapter in the popular series is extremely dramatic and adds another special adventure to the heroics of the good Lord Cecil, not really being an affair of his own, but in the defence of one of his peasantry, who claims the protection of the over-lord. The adventure saves an innocent girl from the clutches of a rascal and the worthy Cecil is rewarded by discovering the whereabouts of Lady Betty, who has again been influenced and in the power of the arch villain Carson. The story has called for an excellent cast, which includes Arthur Johnson, Lottie Briscoe, Howard M. Mitchell and many other Lubin favorites. From a scenic standpoint this is probably the most picturesque number yet released and will add another feather to the bonnet of Emmett Campbell Hall, the romantic author.

A NEW PRODUCING COMPANY.

By F. H. Richardson.

Pleasantville, N. J., six miles from Atlantic City, is to be the home of a new film producing company which sets sail under the title "Acme Producing Company." Steps have already been taken to erect a producing plant of goodly size, and have the same in operation about February 1, 1915. The capital stock of the company will be $50,000, non-assessable; par value one dollar per share; number of shares limited to one thousand per person.

Trade Mark.

Mr. L. Jacoby, formerly with Lubin, and later with the Colorado Film Company, is general manager, and Mr. William Reed, better known as "Vitagraph Bill," the oldest active motion picture operator in the country, is to be Mr. Jacoby's right hand man in the mechanical department.

The ground for the plant was laid out Friday, November 6, and active work is already begun.

The company is largely made up of men experienced in moving picture affairs, therefore it enters the field with experience at its back, as well as a thorough knowledge of the requirements of the trade and the difficulties to be overcome in producing acceptable photoplays. The trade mark of the new company is shown in the illustration.

Billy Reed has a host of friends amongst moving picture people and we are indeed glad that he has broken into the producing end of the game. Billy has plenty of ability and there is no reason in the world why he cannot make good in his new office. In the not distant future, we shall expect to see him smoking big, black cigars, sporting a flock of diamonds, and riding in a limousine.

BOX OFFICE BRANCHES FLOURISHING.

Moe A. Isaacs, one of the executives of the Box Office Attraction Company, who is making a tour of the country visiting Box Office branches, reports exceptional prosperity in all moving picture centers. Cities in which business is particularly booming are: St. Louis, where Charles Werner has been appointed manager; Kansas City, where Mr. Spitzer is now in charge, and Denver, where Field Carmichael will hereafter look after the William Fox productions.

Mr. Issacs writes: "Exhibitors want big features, but they must be good and high class. They will not be satisfied with junk. I am pleased to report that 'Life's Shop Window' and 'The Walls of Jericho' have made a remarkable impression. It's a satisfaction to go about and be received cordially on all sides. Exhibitors throughout the West seem to read the Moving Picture World. I would therefore suggest that prominent mention be made in the paper of the managers in charge of our offices so that exhibitors may be fully acquainted with our men."

K. C. BOOKING CO. IN CANADA.

The K. C. Booking Co., Limited, has been formed and has opened offices in Montreal, Can. The company will handle all of the Kinetophote features in Canada, including such Kinetophote masterpieces as "The Spirit of the Poppy," "The Span of Life," "The Coming Power" and others. "Markia, or The Destruction of Carthage," the Ambrosio production which the Kinetophote owns, will also be booked through the Montreal company.

NEW VITAGRAPH PLAY BY GASKILL.

A new play has been written by Charles L. Gaskill for the Vitagraph Company, to be produced under his direction, that, in addition to calling for a display in full of the rare dramatic art of Miss Helen Gardner and demanding sets of exceptional originality, will contain a feature that has proved a big factor in the success of the big Broadway productions, namely, style.

With his usual careful attention to detail, Mr. Gaskill has given especial consideration to the matter of costuming, by calling to his aid the fashion authorities, and every gown to be worn in the scenes calling for well dressed women will be previously inspected. It is said that the costumes to be used by Miss Gardner are the most magnificent ever used in a picture play.

The title of the piece is "A Breath of Araby" and while Mr. Gaskill describes it as "A pretty little thing," it may be confidently expected to represent the class of pictures he is so ardent an advocate of—real art in motion photography.

"THE GIRL STAGE DRIVER" (Eclair).

A two-reel western drama released by Eclair, Wednesday, December 2, Webster Cullison, director-in-chief, has again demonstrated his peculiar ability to make a film crowded with punches. The story tells of a plucky western girl who takes her dead father's place as stage driver, and single-handed brings to justice two desperadoes who have terrorized the small western town. Edna Payne as the girl stage driver and Norbert A. Myles as the sheriff lend true western personality to the story and the hold-up of the stage coach, running fight with the bandits and their final capture in a deserted well, form most exciting and interesting incidents.

Notes of the Trade

GEORGE ADE gives an excellent burlesque on learning how to make love by correspondence schools; or by the infallible letter-writer, in "The Fable of the Bush League Lover Who Failed to Qualify," released by Essanay December 9. The bashful swain, after he has learned it all by theory, finds that the girls on whom he tries it won't accept it as the real thing.

PITTSBURGH.

THE United States Realty Company has sold for Mayer Brothers the Gem theater in Frankstown avenue, Pittsburgh, at private terms. The purchaser is A. Mintxz, who gave in part payment a farm of fifteen acres and buildings near Marienville, Pa.

There is talk in the East End district of Pittsburgh of another theater for that section. Real estate men who have heard the rumor are not certain as to where the theater will be located. When the Regent theater was opened last week it was believed it would hurt attendance at the other motion picture houses in East Liberty, but, instead, the new one and all the others are crowded nightly, as is the Sheridan, which gives vaudeville and moving pictures. Every night Penn avenue and East Liberty with several squares on Frankstown avenue, are thronged with people seeking amusement, and the more amusement places grow in number the more the people seem to patronize them, all of which makes more business for East Liberty merchants.

The police are endeavoring to prevent the holding of the popular moving picture lectures that have been given each Sunday afternoon for some time by the local organization of the Socialist party. That is the interpretation placed by party leaders upon the announcement made by Director of Public Safety of Pittsburgh Charles S. Hubbard last week that moving picture shows will not be permitted on Sundays hereafter, whether an admission fee is charged or not, and no matter what organization may be sponsor for them. The rule, Director Hubbard said, applies to churches and church organizations as well as to secular gatherings. The Socialists feel certain it is aimed at them. Director Hubbard said: "There is no law or city ordinance governing the matter. It is a question of police regulation. It is felt that if one organization were permitted to have moving picture exhibits on Sunday it would not be fair to refuse any others who might apply. It is a long established rule in Pittsburgh that amusement enterprises shall not remain open on Sunday, and that rule or custom has always been supported by the people of the city. If the police allowed an exhibition of pictures by one organization on Sunday many others would ask the same privileges, and to be fair we should have to grant it. In the end the same conditions would exist here as are seen in some other cities where motion picture shows and other amusement enterprises operate Sundays just as on ordinary business days and our people do not wish such conditions to obtain."

"Berlin," the most talked-of city in the world to-day, was presented pictorially and verbally by E. M. Newman at Carnegie music hall on Thursday evening, November 13. When Mr. Newman arrived in Berlin last summer such a war as has since broken out was not even a remote possibility. In leisurely fashion he proceeded to photograph the many improvements which have been made since his previous visits —new public buildings, theaters, statues, splendid thoroughfares and the stadium where the Olympic games were to be held. The gayety of the city, rivalling even that of Paris, was "caught" by his motion picture camera, as was also the busy-day life of the sturdy people.

The East End now has in the Regent theater one of the finest motion picture theaters in the country. It was planned and built specially for motion pictures and is the first amusement place on Penn avenue, East Liberty, to be located west of Highland avenue. The general opinion prevails that the Regent will prove an extraordinary good money-maker. Pictures are shown two days each, the Paramount and Alco productions exclusively constituting the program. Clark & Rowland are the owners of the magnificent new house.

An ordinance was introduced regulating the construction, arrangement, ventilation, lighting and heating of buildings, safes and cabinets for the storage of nitro-cellulose motion picture films. The ordinance would require a permit from the Bureau of Fire Prevention for the storage of such films

Johnstown's, Pa., new $200,000 picture theater, The Garden, is rapidly nearing completion. George C. Knox, manager of the house, was in Pittsburgh recently arranging for pictures and other matters for The Garden, which, it is expected, will open November 23. He arranged for Universal service, the Alco pictures and "The Master Key," the new Universal serial. The Garden Theater Company consists of over one hundred stockholders. The building is erected according to the most approved plans for safety and convenience. The equipment is being supplied by Ludwig Hommel & Co., of Pittsburgh. The following are the officers of the company: Morris Stayer, M.D., president; George Wild, architect, vice-president; George C. Knox, secretary and manager; Harry G. Gardner, treasurer. These gentlemen, together with Earl C. Montgomery, compose the directorate. The company also owns the Lyric theater in the same city, of which Mr. Montgomery is manager.

A handsome building is being erected in Monongahela, Pa. by H. K. Bentley, which will be used as a moving picture house and storerooms, the structure costing $30,000. The theater will have a capacity of four hundred and will be modern in every respect.

J. P. Aikens, proprietor of the Nittany theater, at State College, Pa., has retired, and J. L. Blackford, manager, has entire charge and will continue endeavoring to follow out his own ideas in providing entertainment.

In reference to borough taxation of motion picture houses, it has been learned that Canonsburg, Pa., imposes no tax. Indiana, Pa., has a tax of $3 per month and Masontown, Pa., imposes a tax of $25 per year.

Charles Hemphill, stage manager of the Alhambra theater, Beaver Falls, Pa., and Miss Harriet Woods, of Jamestown, N. Y., were married on the night of Thursday, November 13 at 8 o'clock, at the home of the groom's mother, at 810 Second avenue, Beaver Falls.

Although the Box Office Attraction Company of Pittsburgh, Pa., has only been in business about two months, they have found it necessary to remodel their office in order to properly handle the large volume of business already coming to them. Partitions have been erected and every inch of floor space is being used to the best advantage.

J. A. Bonheyo, formerly manager of the Royal theater, South Side, Pittsburgh, Pa., is now managing the Lyric theater, George Lorch's house at 1217 Carson street.

J. H. Genter, president of the J. H. Genter Company of New York, manufacturers of the mirroroide screen, was in Pittsburgh recently and spent some time at the Feature Film & Calcium Light Company, local agents for the screen. Mr. Genter says his company is now experimenting with a view toward eliminating the seams in the screen, which will greatly enhance its value.

G. R. Ainsworth, formerly with Mr. Day in George Kleine's offices in Pittsburgh, is now engaged as general road representative for the Box Office Attraction Company, and will act in the capacity of adjuster and other work in that line.

B. Hoffman has purchased the Lyric theater, at Du Bois, Pa., from J. Kite.

MANLEY.

MISSOURI.

J. C. WOOLF, manager of the Kansas City office of the Warner's Features, doesn't know just "where he is at." He has been appointed to the "Mountain Territory," which includes Denver and Salt Lake, and he expected to leave over a week ago. However, his successor in Kansas City has not been appointed, and Mr. Woolf continues "to live out of his trunks," which have been packed for some time.

The quarters of the Universal which were burned out several weeks ago are being repaired as rapidly as possible and it is expected that they will be occupied within a short time. The company at present is still occupying the quarters formerly occupied by the Mutual before their removal to the Ozark building.

The National Feature Company will open offices in Kansas City within a short time. The makes of films and the directors of the company are to be announced later.

The C. & A. Film & Theater Brokerage Company has taken over the exclusive booking for Kansas, Missouri and Oklahoma for the Vi-T-Aphone.

J. Irwin Dodson, former manager of the Kansas City office of the Ramo, is now booking Kleinschmidt's Arctic Hunt pictures.

The Royal theater is putting in a glass front; that is, there is being constructed in front of the theater a framework that will be filled in with plate glass. The reason for this addition is that it affords a storm protection. The appearance of the theater has not been impaired in the least, and as a matter of fact the improvement might be said to add attractiveness. And, no doubt, when the very cold days of winter come the appearance of warmth behind the glass will invite many new patrons.

The Twelfth Street theater has again got its photoplayer at work, much to the satisfaction of Manager Durrin, who for several nights toiled into the "wee sma' hours" on the instrument. Besides the photoplayer the management has recently added a piano and violin.

All summer long the streets in front of the Palace theater were torn up while being repaired. This work had hardly been completed when the building next door was torn down and a restaurant built. The restaurant was completed several days ago and the management of the Palace thought that they would have a chance to continue their business undisturbed. But no such good fortune was to come, for the first of last week it was decided to build a restaurant on the other side, and the work has been commenced.

The Landers theater, at Springfield, Mo., is doing an immense business of late and several times have shown to capacity. There are two reasons for the unusually good business. The first is that good pictures are booked, such as "Neptune's Daughter," and "Les Miserables," both of which have done an immense business. The second is extensive advertising.

J. Coles, of Kansas City, Mo., is opening a fine theater in Blue Springs, Mo. Performances will be given as soon as the building can be wired for electricity and the projecting apparatus installed.

Members of the Moving Picture Operator's association gave a dance in Kansas City, November 17, at the Casino hall. Practically every motion picture theater in Kansas City had been carrying slides of the event and the event was largely attended.

The Victoria Opera House, at Windsor, Mo., has been doing a fine business with "The Million Dollar Mystery." The house seats 520 and at every show standing room is at a premium.

The Star theater, at Hannibal, Mo., turned people away when it showed "The Wrath of the Gods" recently. Manager Price is making an effort to give Hannibal the best that the film market affords, and recently, when he announced that he would show Evelyn Nesbit Thaw in "The Threads of Destiny," several hundred requests for reserved seats came within a short time.

BROWN.

CINCINNATI.

BIG Sunday audiences were handled by the Victoria, on McMillan avenue, with the five-reel Lubin production of "Threads of Destiny," featuring Evelyn Nesbit Thaw and her son, as the drawing card. That people are still interested in the notorious Thaw case, to a certain extent, was shown by the crowds which filled the Victoria, as they have other houses showing this picture, although, of course, the merits of the production may have had something to do with it.

The importance of Cincinnati as a film center, due to the large number of exchanges located here, brings many exhibitors in from a distance for the purpose of arranging for attractions for their houses. Among those who visited the exchanges last week, for instance, were L. H. Hyman and C. E. Tipton, owners of the Lyric, one of the larger houses of Huntington, W. Va., and E. C. Helman, of the Victoria, Springfield, O.

The Animated Advertising Company, Cincinnati's film publicity concern, which has been active in reducing to motion pictures local events of interest, as well as industrial scenes for city advertising purposes, is extending its operations to numerous other towns in the State, T. A. Needham, representing the company, visiting Wilmington recently and arranging to take scenes of interest there. The pictures are to be exhibited at the Cub theater, and will include street scenes, factories, business houses and other matters of interest.

The International Film Products Company, a concern which recently came to Cincinnati with the view to turning out, leasing and marketing feature productions, as well as handling other matter, completed a deal recently which may be one of considerable profit to it, by purchasing from the Kentucky Exposition Company the rights for making motion pictures of Kentucky industrial for exhibition at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. The proceeds of the sale, said to be about $75,000, will be expended by the State in the construction of a building to represent it at the Exposition, which would otherwise have been impossible, as no appropriation had been made for the purpose. Frank E. Aid, general manager of the film company, closed the deal. W. C. Coyle is now engaged in making arrangements with the several large cities of Kentucky, and with industrial concerns located in them, for pictures which will be shown in the Kentucky building.

J. W. Popp, C. W. Popp and others, of Cincinnati, recently incorporated the Main Amusement Company, with a capital stock of $50,000, and will shortly make arrangements for the construction of an up-to-date motion picture theater.

The new decorations recently completed at the Dome theater, in Youngstown, O., have been the subject of much favorable comment from patrons of the house, as they are usually tasteful and attractive. The Dome is showing to good business, with a careful selection of meritorious features, and "The Million Dollar Mystery" to help out once a week.

The Grand, of Hamilton, O., which has run pretty largely to vaudeville during the past season, has inaugurated a new policy for Sundays, on account of the fact that a great many of the vaudeville performers in the acts booked cannot get into the town on Sunday. The Grand will therefore run a big motion picture program on Sunday, with only two acts of vaudeville, continuous shows being the rule, and the management believes that in this way it will do quite as well as with two shows a day of vaudeville, by handling more people. Last Sunday five reels of pictures were shown, including "Our Mutual Girl's" latest, a two-reel Keystone, and "The Ambassador's Envoy," a two-part Domino.

Manager William John, of the Park Hall theater, the big and popular playhouse out on Madison avenue, in Oakley, Cincinnati, reports that notwithstanding his seating capacity of over 800, he is "turning 'em away" on feature nights, drawing business from Hyde Park and other nearby suburbs which are closer to town. Manager John has made it a rule to have at least one night of vaudeville each week, in connection with his motion picture programs, pointing out that there are many people who do not like the long trip downtown to the vaudeville theaters, and will attend even one or two turns at his theater in preference; and he therefore meets this demand, with considerable profit.

The Bosworth film presentation of "The Valley of the Moon," one of Jack London's latest stories, and one of the Paramount series, which has been secured by the Lyric theater, of Portsmouth, O., was shown there on Friday of last week, the prices being raised to ten cents for the afternoon and twenty cents at night for the occasion. The management felt that the merit of the attraction, as of other big features shown under the Paramount brand, warranted the increased price, and the size of the audience proved that this view was correct.

The universal interest in the war, felt in Portsmouth as well as elsewhere, was responsible for good houses when the Lyric theater recently ran the two-reel Vitagraph, entitled "Warfare in the Skies," showing some remarkable pictures of aeroplanes in deadly action.

In connection with the recent teachers' convention held in Chillicothe, O., Manager Smith, of the Queen theater, made a pronounced hit with the pedagogues by inviting them to witness a special performance at his theater as his guests. One feature of this performance was a reel showing the historical pageant held at Columbus last year, which was planned by H. H. Bennett, of Chillicothe, and these pictures were of unusual interest, both to those teachers who had seen the affair and those who had not.

The Superba theater, in Delaware, O., one of the numerous theaters which has suffered by reason of the failure of the Ohio censors to get to certain pictures by the time expected, put the blame where it belonged when "Wives" did not get to it at the advertised time. The management ran a note in its advertising, stating just why the picture was not shown at the time expected.

CASEY.

KENTUCKY.

THE new Alamo theater of the Fourth Avenue Amusement Company, Louisville, was opened for business at 2 o'clock on Saturday afternoon, November 14. The house was not quite finished as far as details went, and temporary lighting fixtures had to be used for ceiling lights. A number of very handsome floral offerings from supply houses, people who had work on the building and other theaters were placed in the main lobby. Capacity crowds were in attendance from the moment the doors were opened. During Saturday and Sunday the total number of paid admissions amounted to fourteen thousand, and a number of persons were admitted on passes and complimentary tickets. The back part of the house was crowded with persons unable to get seats, in spite of the fact that there are eleven hundred of them. M. Switow, president and general manager of the company, was more than pleased with results.

Ernest Deal, of New Albany, Ind., one of the five moving picture men for whom warrants Sunday motion picture shows, was tried on Saturday night, November 14. The case was booked as the State vs. Ernest Deal. Little time was consumed before the jury reached a verdict acquitting him of the charge. It is understood the decision was based on the contention that the State had failed to prove that Deal was manager or ticket seller for the Dream theater. The other four cases have not come to trial so far.

It is probable that steps will be taken in the spring to enlarge the Preston theater, Louisville, which has had considerable difficulty in seating its patrons this fall. The "Million Dollar Mystery" has proven so popular that only standing room has been sold after 7:30 o'clock in the evening for some time past.

Southern shipments are picking up considerably with the S. & P. Film Supply Company, of Louisville. November 16 was the largest day on the company's books, but new records are being made steadily in volume of bookings. The concern has employed a cook and is now feeding the entire force on the premises, which facilitates business considerably. This company has a larger force than any other exchange in the city and is now working two stenographers steadily. Fred Sheldon has returned from another film buying trip to Chicago and Indianapolis, and Charles Pressy is busy in Savannah and other southern cities.

The South End Amusement Company, of Louisville, has filed articles of incorporation in which its capital stock is listed at $25,000. The incorporators are Henry B. Strube, Henry G. Peltier, J. M. Keaney and W. C. Duncan. The articles were at first filed under the name of the Shelby Amusement Company, but it was discovered that an old incorporation which formerly operated the present Palace theater, had never been dissolved, although it was out of business, and, therefore, the name had to be changed. The new company proposes to operate a chain of moving picture theaters and is authorized to incur an indebtedness equal to its capital stock. Plans have been completed for the "Shelby theater," the first one of the string. This building will be erected at Shelby and Gwendolyn streets, and will cost approximately $18,000. Ground will be broken at once, as contracts are now being awarded. The building will be of concrete and steel and will seat 900 persons. The latest appliances and fireproof construction will be used throughout.

The Olio theater, Louisville, a moving picture show for colored people, which for some years has been operated in the Colored Odd Fellows' building by William Hogan, has been sold to Wilhoit, Collier, Clifford & Dehart, who also own the Ruby, another colored picture house which is close by. The Olio will be closed for a few days undergoing improvements, after which it will be reopened by the new management.

The Central Film Service Company, Louisville, is showing an increase in business in spite of the war and other adverse conditions. A demand for higher priced and better grade features is also being felt, and A. C. Farrel, the local manager, is very well satisfied with the present outlook.

D. Levenson, manager of the Novelty Theater Company, Louisville, who some time ago bought up a lot of old films with the intention of opening the Novelty Film Company, has given up the idea and has sold the reels he purchased. A good deal of competition has come into the field for one and two reels for fill-in purposes, and Mr. Levenson decided the field was somewhat overworked as it was.

Local motion picture men have been conjecturing as to what will be done with Hopkins theater, Louisville, which was burned some months ago. It was announced at the time that the building would be rebuilt and the picture shows continued, but nothing has been done with the proposition so far.

S. Mansfield, of Glasgow, Ky., was recently in Louisville, where he purchased a road outfit. He expects to travel through the South, and will exhibit in school houses or other convenient buildings.

The Mengel Box Company, of Louisville, is operating a motion picture house at one of its big lumber camps, near Columbia, Tenn. The show is operated free of charge for the employes, and has helped to keep them contented with their isolation.

F. E. Hammer, of the Mutual Film Corporation, Louisville, reports business picking up steadily. He was well pleased with the way in which the Keystone comedy, "Dough and Dynamite," went at the opening performance at the new Alamo theater. Mr. Hammer has been spending a good deal of time lately out in the State getting personally acquainted with the exhibitors.

Howard Clark, of the "Arista theater," of Lebanon, Ky., was recently in Louisville, where he contracted for Mutual service. He has been busy for some time remodeling the old opera house, which will be used for a motion picture house. This house was formerly used for legitimate plays only.

Kenneth Meguire, president of the Harlan Coal Mining Company, with headquarters in Louisville and mines in Harlan County, Ky., announces that the company will erect a building at the mining camp at once, to be used for a motion picture show. A frame building will be put up which will have a seating capacity of about 200. Pictures relative to "Safety First," "First Aid to the Injured," etc., will be shown for the education of the miners. The first of these pictures will be supplied by the Red Cross Society of America. Special pictures will also be supplied by the Federal Bureau of Mines. Hygienic films will also be shown. Comedy, features and a regular program will also be used. The plant will be completed before bad weather sets in if possible. It has not been decided whether the house will be leased out on contract to some moving picture man, or whether the company will employ its own men to operate it. Admissions of five and ten cents will be charged, probably, but the company expects to lose some money on the venture, except in the good it will do in keeping its employees on the job and away from evil influences. About 300 men and their families are located in the camp.

CHURCH.

DETROIT.

THE Alhambra, Detroit's newest and handsomest photoplay house, was opened Tuesday evening, November 10. It is located at the corner of Woodward and Kenilworth avenues, in the residential and semi-business district, and is operated by John H. Kunsky, who also controls the Garden, Columbia, Liberty, Casino, Royal, Empress and Washington theaters. To say that the house was packed at every show, and that thousands were turned away would be like "repeating an old chestnut," nevertheless, it was a fact, and the interesting part of it was that the crowd comprised the very best people in the city. Some of the finest homes in Detroit are located in the North Woodward district, where the Alhambra is situated, and it is to the occupants of these homes that this new playhouse will cater. The Alhambra can seat comfortably 1,500 persons. The decorative scheme is that of a garden. Novel lighting effects are created by the use of wickerwork. Red and yellow electric globes are hidden in artificial foliage, suspended from trellis work on each side of the proscenium. A diffused pale, yellow light is cast over the house from side panels of Oriental pattern. A mezzanine balcony is designed in boxes to cater to motoring parties. The finishing touches are yet to be put to the interior; these will include a beautifully-furnished foyer, provided with wicker chairs, wicker screened lights and heavy carpets. The cost of the Alhambra is about $100,000. It is owned by Mrs. Hugo Hill, and C. Howard Crane was the architect. The contractors and builders were Frank Farrington & Co. The theater is under the direct charge of T. D. Moule, formerly manager of the Liberty; the leader of the orchestra is Fred L. Neddermeyer, a prominent musician, who is giving a series of band concerts Sunday afternoons at a local playhouse with fifty musicians. Mary Pickford, in "Behind the Scenes," was the attraction the opening night. The policy of the house will be a daily matinee at 2 P. M. and continuous show from 6.45 to 11 P. M. On Saturdays there will be two matinees, 1.45 and 3.30, while on Sundays and holidays entertainment will be continuous from 1.45 to 11 P. M. Prices are 10 cents for the first 20 rows in the evening; 15 cents for the last 18 rows, and 20 cents for mezzanine box seats. At the matinees, except Sundays and holidays, all seats will be 10 cents. Pictures will be changed daily. The Hearst-Selig Current Events will be shown on Thursdays and the Strand War News Saturday evenings.

"Zudora," the stupendous serial by the Thanhouser Syndicate Corporation, is running weekly at the Empire. This theater is also showing a two-reel Keystone comedy every other Sunday.

The building at Woodward and Harper avenues is being remodeled and when completed will contain a moving picture theater to be known as the Harper.

The Atlas Motion Picture Company, of Detroit, has been organized with a capital stock of $20,000, the principal stockholders being Percy R. Upton, Florence L. Upton and Charles G. Roos. It is the purpose of the concern to produce pictures.

The first reels of "The Master Key" were shown in this city Sunday, November 15, at which time the serial was published in the News-Tribune. Included among the theaters to show the serial is the new Rosedale theater, at 2395 Woodward avenue, which is not yet opened, but which, according to its proprietor, William F. Klatt, will be by December 15, at the latest. Mr. Klatt was in hopes of getting the Rosedale opened Thanksgiving Day.

Messrs. Lipp and Cross, who operate a chain of picture theaters in Battle Creek, were visitors in Detroit on November 18.

The Grand Boulevard Theater Company has opened offices at 2033 Dime Bank building, and a campaign will start at once for the sale of the company's stock; the capitalization will be increased from $100,000 to $150,000. Two brokers have been engaged to assist in selling the stock. As soon as a sufficient amount is raised the contracts will be let in full and the construction work started enabling the theater to open early in the summer.

Goddie Rosenbaum, ex-police commissioner of Kalamazoo, and general manager of the Kalamazoo Amusement Company, operating the Elite, Colonial, Orpheum and Lyric theaters, was a visitor in Detroit on November 16, and signed with the Casino Feature Film Company for the Paramount service. Mr. Rosenbaum is also interested financially in the Empress in Grand Rapids, the Empress in Fort Wayne, and the Orpheum in Flint. To Mr. Rosenbaum is largely due the credit for the victory of Sunday theaters in Kalamazoo, which started November 22.

Harry Goldberg, general sales manager of the Casino Feature Film Company, reports that the All-Star Program is going very nicely in every section of Michigan.

Although Charles Davie has taken over the Alco rights for Michigan, they do not include the coming four releases, or the releases of the All-Star which have been or will be made since October 5. These four pictures will be handled by the Casino Feature Film Company for Michigan. Mr. Davie has opened elaborate offices at 260-262 Equity building, but will not handle films there, as he has secured space in another building for this purpose. The offices in the Equity building will be to transact the regular business; one office will be for the stenographer as well as a general reception room; the other will be Mr. Davie's private office, while a third and smaller room will be for the bookkeeping department. The three offices have been equipped with mahogany furniture and are richly carpeted. Mr. Davie reports that so far he has had applications for twenty-seven theaters in Michigan for the Alco bookings.

The new Jewell theater at 448 Gratiot avenue opened for the first time Saturday, November 14. It seats 600, all on the main floor. There will be no matinees except on Saturday, Sunday and holidays.

Wesley Schram, manager of the Monroe theater, and president of the Wolverine Feature Film Company, will return Thanksgiving Day from an extended hunting trip in the northern part of Michigan.

The Columbia theater has been showing pictures of the Michigan-Pennsylvania football game which took place recently at Ann Arbor. Motion pictures of the Michigan-Cornell game were shown before the annual banquet of the Michigan Alumni at the Hotel Tuller Roof, Saturday, November 21; the following Sunday they were shown at the Empire.

Charles W. Porter, who has been manager of the Miles theater since it opened in May, 1910, resigned November 15 to become affiliated with Fred A. Lee in the construction of a chain of theaters, the first of which is now being erected in Youngstown, Ohio, to be known as the Hippodrome, seating over 2,000 persons. Mr. Porter says theaters will be built only in towns having over 100,000 population. They will be devoted to high-class motion pictures. Dr. Paul C. Dulitz, treasurer of the Miles theater, has been appointed manager, and Gordon Damon remains as assistant manager. The Miles plays vaudeville and pictures, with a two-hour picture entertainment preceding each show in the afternoons, except Sunday. This idea originated with Mr. Porter and was proposed to stimulate the matinee business. And it did. Following the final curtain in the Miles Saturday evening, November 14, Mr. Porter was asked to go on the stage, where he was immediately surrounded by the house staff and presented with a handsome chair, while Mrs. Porter was the recipient of a rocker. The presentation was made on behalf of Mr. Porter's associates by former Mayor Lew Shank, of Indianapolis, who was playing an engagement at the theater that week.

Robert Williamson, of the Detroit Free Press Printing Company, of this city, is realizing a handsome profit each week from the picture "The Spoilers," for which he has the Michigan rights outside of Wayne county. Wherever the picture is exhibited, it is drawing capacity houses. Charles Hirschman is associated with Mr. Williamson in controlling the Michigan rights.

Architect Alvin E. Harley has been taking figures on the remodeling of a double brick store building into a brick theater and office building, location being on Woodward avenue.

A motion picture called "Steve's Awakening," was shown at the Detroit Board of Commerce November 22, in connection with a special meeting on safety first, at which Marcus A. Dow, general safety agent of the New York Central lines, was the principal speaker. Mr. Dow is the author of the picture, which was produced in New York.

Francis Reno entertained the members of the Detroit School Board on Monday evening, November 16, with a Pathescope machine and a picture showing a fight between a snake and a mongoose. It was thoroughly enjoyed; in fact, so enthusiastic were the members about the machine that steps were taken immediately to provide for an appropriation that would permit of the purchase outright of an adequate moving pjicture equipment for use in the public schools. One member of the board said: "I am going to devote my time from now on to getting a $7,500 appropriation from the board of estimates to be devoted to the purchase and operation of moving picture machines for use in the schools. I believe the moving picture machine is one of the greatest aids to the education of children that modern ingenuity has produced." Superintendent of Schools Charles E. Chadsey said: "I should like to see every school in Detroit equipped with a moving picture machine. I feel that the day is coming when it will be considered a necessary part of the school equipment." The superintendent said it would take between $80,000 and $100,000 to equip all the schools with moving picture machines.

SMITH.

BOSTON.

BOSTON'S greatest playhouse passed from the drama to the moving picture on Monday, November 23, when the great Boston theater, on Washington street, was opened with the silent drama of Rex Beach's great novel, "The Spoilers." This theatre has been the most historic and storied house in the city. It has been the scene of many dramatic triumphs. The largest productions that have ever played in this city have been seen there as the stage is larger than that of any playhouse in the city. Before the new Boston Opera House was erected, the Boston Grand Opera season was always held in this theater.

The sudden change in the policy of this house came somewhat as a surprise. W. H. Leahy had a season's lease on the place, but the failure of his operatic and stock projects turned the house back to the owners, the B. F. Keith interests. This concern then decided to enter the moving picture field in a big way. For many years, their Bijou Dream has been devoted to pictures, but the policy there has always been of the "drop-in" variety. The present plan is to operate the Boston like the Strand, with a large symphony orchestra and high-class acts. Robert J. Jannette, formerly of the Globe theater of this city, and during the last year manager of the Metropolitan Opera House in Philadelphia, has assumed the management of this enterprise. Continuous shows are to be given, starting at 10 o'clock in the morning and closing at 10:30 at night.

The Nation theater, on Tremont street, Keith's newest house in this city, which up to this season was used for vaudeville, but which has been vacant since the closing of last season, was opened with moving pictures on November 16. This playhouse has a big seating capacity. Two shows are being given daily. The opening of these two new houses gives the Keith interests three film houses and one vaudeville house in the city.

The Boston police are determined to suppress any rowdyism on the part of the audiences in the moving picture houses in this city. Many complaints have been received from the management of these houses, regarding the action of certain persons in the audience, who must give vent to their opinions on any act or film that does not meet with their approval. Police officers have been instructed to arrest any of these offenders. Already Captain Sullivan, of the Court square station, in whose district a large number of the houses are located, has had two prosecutions for these disturbances. In one case the offender tried to resist arrest, but he had to be treated at the hospital for a fractured nose in addition to paying a fine when he was arraigned in court.

The city of Boston has decided to become exhibitors of moving pictures. It is now planned to give moving picture shows for the boys, who are inmates of the reform school on Rainsford Island, Boston Harbor. This decision was arrived at after a hard fight by Councilman William H. Woods, who introduced the order for photoplays after a visit to the city institution. The councilman was very much impressed with the conditions at the school. He said that the boys were gathered in groups in a large hall. A few of them were reading, but the great majority of them were apparently seeking something to occupy their minds. It was then that the moving picture idea had its birth. At the next meeting of the city council his famous moving picture order was introduced. The mayor and members of the council asked time to take the matter under advisement, but Woods was not satisfied. He communicated with J. A. Eslow, of the Universal Film Exchange office, and the machine was donated. The first show was held on Thanksgiving night, when a party of city officials were the guests at the opening performance. It is planned to give bi-weekly shows, featuring educational films.

"Dick" Sears, the New England cameraman for the Hearst-Selig Weekly, had an interesting experience last week when he made the trip from the Charlestown Navy Yard to Newport, R. I., on the new American submarine K6. The trip was a long one for a submarine, for which any extended trip is a rarity. Dick remarks, "If you are on an aeroplane and start to drop, you have some idea of your landing place, but on one of those submarines, you never know where you'll land. Those things roll and rock to beat the band. Maybe I wasn't some seasick." As an alibi for his sickness, he claims that even the members of the crew were seasick.

The large ballroom at the Copley-Plaza hotel, Copley square, was turned over to moving pictures on Friday afternoon, November 20, at the fair of the Vincent Club, an exclusive women's organization. Five reels of pictures were projected. Between the reels there was fancy dancing. The entertainment was under the direction of Miss Nora Saltonstall, a member of one of the old Colonial families.

Moving picture entertainments will be given to raise money to pay for the erection of the Ronan Memorial building, attached to the parish of Mgr. Peter Ronan's parish in Dorchester. Performances for adults will be given on every Tuesday night, while children's shows will be given every Saturday afternoon.

The management of the Boston Opera House has announced that in the future it will show Paramount pictures. The first picture to be shown will be Jesse Lasky's production of "The Circus Man."

The old Frohman house, the Park theater, is being renovated for moving picture shows. It was planned to open this house on the first of November, but the alteration work was not completed. It is believed that the house will not open before the first of December.

The photoplay performance at the Exeter street theater was supplemented on Thanksgiving Eve by a miscellaneous entertainment. The proceeds will go to employ women otherwise idle, in making clothes for the soldiers engaged in the great European conflict.

McCLOSKEY.

NEBRASKA.

MANAGERS in Lincoln are discussing the probability of giving picture shows on Sunday. While there is no organized movement against the plan city officials are to be of the opinion that public sentiment is against it.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE poor business disease is prevalent in the National Capital at the present time, and this is particularly true with the exhibitors who have small houses. To get the theater-going public interested, the exhibitor must have something big or exceptional to offer. This means an added expense and a theater must have capacity to offset this. A neighborhood house, having a capacity of slightly over four hundred, has been forced to resort to the use of feature films that cost up to $35 per day in order to hold its own and even then the results were such as would not warrant a continuation of this practice. There are quite a number of exhibitors, if the truth were known, who would be glad to dispose of their holdings at a nominal figure and all are paring down expenses, except as to service, to the utmost. There are several things that are responsible for decreased dividends. In the first place, all lines of business are suffering from a general depression. The weather has been decidedly unseasonable and last week saw the first cold snap of the present season. Money is far from being easy, and the spending powers of the people are decidedly limited. The war has had a good deal to do with the matter; just why it should in a city in which the majority of the residents are employees of the United States government, with regular stated pay days and salaries, is a question beyond the ken of most people.

The bad business plague is not confined entirely to Washington according to Harry Church, of the Bonita theater, in Norfolk, Va., who was a visitor here during the week, for Mr. Church told the World correspondent that business in that place was so flat that it would almost take an earthquake to shake things up a bit. Six reels for a nickel in that town is nothing, for in order to enjoy the usual patronage some of the houses have been forced to show even more reels than that and naturally suffered a setback in the matter of profit. He states that this complaint is general in Norfolk and that the theaters there are opening an hour or more later in the day and closing earlier in the evening. It takes the very best of productions to make a showing anywhere at the present time he said.

Manassas, Va., now has a real live motion picture house, according to the latest reports from that section, for Messrs. Lion & May have opened in that place its first theater.

Jack Warner, of San Francisco, Cal., and his bride were noted among the visitors here last week. It was stated that Mr. and Mrs. Warner's visit formed a part of a honeymoon trip which included New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and other Eastern cities. They are now on their way back to the coast city where Mr. Warner is in charge of a motion picture exchange.

Will H. Thomas, who formerly conducted a motion picture business in the old riding academy at Twenty-second and P streets, Northwest, but who is now connected with the projectors of the Panama-Pacific Exposition, gave a private exhibition here at Keith's theater of a multiple reel feature, entitled "Money," which was taken in the neighborhood of San Francisco. A number of exchange men and exhibitors viewed the feature.

Among the visitors here during the week were L. A. Getzler, from the New York office of the Greater New York Film Rental Company; J. E. Osmet, of the Fairfax theater, Culpepper, Va., and A. Jacobs, of the Casino theater, Richmond, Va.

Warner's Features, Inc., are now releasing through their local office a four-reel daily program, which is said to be meeting with much favor in this territory, and Sidney P. Lust, manager of the branch, reports a very good business.

"Have You Paid the War Tax Yet? November 30 last day. Failure to Pay Causes a Fine," reads a sign which Lieut. Jim P. Anderson, manager of the local branch of the Greater New York Film Rental Company, is having prepared and which will be placed in a conspicuous place in his office. The lack of knowledge on the part of many of the exhibitors as to the penalty involved for delinquency in paying the tax has prompted Mr. Anderson to take this action.

Charles Wheeler, a member of the staff of the Chicago Tribune, exhibited for the members of the Press Club, an organization composed of newspaper men, some four thousand feet of film obtained by the photographer of the Tribune, the latter is still in the field with the armies. This was a first showing of the film.

Andrew J. Benton, proprietor of the Florida Motion Picture theater, was awarded a verdict in his favor before a jury in Criminal Court No. 2, before Justice Anderson, in a suit to recover $300 damages brought against him by Harry Davis. The plaintiff asserted that he purchased two tickets to enter the theater, but admission was refused. The case was heard on an appeal from the Municipal Court.

S. J. Mayer, formerly manager of the local office of the General Film Corporation, assumed a similar position at the Washington Film Exchange last Monday. Mr. Lavalle, who has been serving in that capacity, will continue at this exchange as assistant manager.

Secretary of the Interior Franklin K. Kane, and members of the Home Club, an organization composed of employees of the Interior Department, were shown the first production of a feature covering a trip through Yellowstone Park, made by the Thanhouser Company, and shown here for the first time.

CLARENCE L. LINZ.

INDIANA.

ALEX CORNUTT, Westport, has been taken in as a partner by Clyde B. Willard, Greensburg, in the management of the Westport theater at Westport, Ind. The name of the theater will be changed under the new management and is to be known in the future as the New Theater.

The lid will be clamped on the Indianapolis moving picture show that attempts to operate on Sunday without contributing to charity. This decision was made following a conference between Chief Perrott of the police and Wm. Isenlohr, who has charge of the Bell charity fund. Mr. Isenlohr presented a long list of moving picture houses from which no contributions have been received. Mr. Isenlohr says that Mayor Bell wished to close all the moving picture houses on Sunday some time ago but he took no action because it was pointed out that the contributions were needed for charity work. Mr. Isenlohr states that some of the houses which have refused to contribute to the fund have doubled their price on Sunday in the name of "charity."

Ernest Deal, managing the Jeffersonville, Ind., house of the Switow Amusement Company, was acquitted by a jury of the charge of violating the Sunday law. The defense urged that Michael Switow, being a Jew who observed Saturday as his Sabbath, was exempt in person and in his employees from the Sunday law. The theater runs on Saturday, too, it was brought out in the trial.

Kruyer, Collector of Revenue in the sixth district, which includes fifty-nine Indiana counties, has decided that a picture show which adds anything to the film program other than an orchestra, is elevating the show into the concert class. This subjects the theater to a tax of from $15 to $90 a year, according to the seating capacity. The ruling comes as the result of the special war tax effecting amusement places. The taxes are due December 1 and are charged from November 1.

There will also be frequent programs of vaudeville in conjunction with the regular quota of moving pictures.

A deal has been closed whereby John W. Cochran becomes the sole proprietor of the Theato, Washington, Ind. Mr. Cochran purchased the half interest of his partner, James T. Laymon. Mr. Laymon has no plans for the immediate future. He opened the first motion picture theater in Washington, which was the third one in Indiana. Manager Rogers of Crump's theater, Columbus, Ind., gave his first film show Thanksgiving day. The house is devoted to the legitimate. He will continue to use plays and vaudeville, but

THE annual banquet of the Toronto Moving Picture Operators was held Thursday, November 19, in Williams Cafe, and about sixty operators with their friends were present. Beside a musical program there were numerous speeches. The principal event of the evening was a speech by Phil Kauffman, manager of the Famous Players Film Service, on "The Relation of the Operator to the Film Exchange."

The General Film Company has made arrangements with the Y. M. C. A., and is giving a free moving picture show every night at the Exhibition grounds, where over 2,000 members of the second Canadian contingent who leave for the front next month are encamped. Since the show was started the number of demands for "night leave" from the soldier boys has been reduced to almost nil. The average attendance at the show is over 1,500.

R. J. Bruce, manager of the Crystal theater in West Toronto, Walter Appleton of the Peoples theater, and George Welsman, manager of the La Plaza theater, have each discontinued his vaudeville acts, and from now on will run moving pictures exclusively. Each has secured options on the Famous Players Paramount releases and will start the new programs at once.

The managers of the uptown theaters in Toronto are face to face with another problem. Since the beginning of the war the attendances at these and the suburban theaters has been steadily decreasing, while those downtown have been playing to packed houses. There are over a dozen motion picture theaters in the immediate downtown area, and four of these, the Strand, the Majestic, the Hippodrome and Loew's Yonge Street theater, have each a seating capacity of over 1,500, while the Colonial seats nearly 1,000; the others are smaller. All of these theaters are now featuring moving pictures. The uptown mangers have tried every conceivable method to stop the rush of the public cityward but have not succeeded yet. It looks as if some of them will have to throw up the sponge very shortly unless things change.
